EVENING NEWS.

FOR THE LADIES.

A SIGNAL FOR EXTRAVAGANT GIRLS.

[From the San Francisco Chronicle.]

My friend Clotilde is a slight, graceful girl of nineteen, with a queenly step and lustrous brown eyes, at times aglow with fun and laughter, tender with compassion, or dreamy and doubting. Her young life fascinates and interests me, for I see in it the promise of a noble and gracious womanhood, and I pray God the blight may never touch it which will destroy these generous impulses in their dawn and convert the young life into a tragedy, as with so many young girls in these days. A few mornings ago, as I sat in my little sitting room, engaged in the very wifely task of restoring absconding buttons to certain articles of Christopher's apparel, the door opened and Clotilde came in. Her dress was a rich brown silk, with trimmings of a gold-brown shade, and the blended colors rippled and shimmered as she walked. A nut-brown plume on her hat dropped down on her chestnut hair, and had it not been for the face with its shell tints, I might have imagined her some young empress cast in bronze, stepped down from her pedestal. Clotilde's father is a wealthy banker, and she is always elegantly dressed. She dropped down on a low hassock at my feet, and as I looked into the upturned face, I saw not a trace of the empress there, but a woful look of sorrow and self-reproach and the trace of tears on her cheeks.

"Oh, Mrs. Christopher, my life is a bitter mistake," she cried. "I, and a thousand other girls in San Francisco like me, am daily bringing distress and misery into happy households, and driving struggling and worthy men to wreck and ruin."

"You, my dear! You must be wild to accuse yourself so bitterly."

"No, I am not wild, though I have just come from a scene that might well make me so. Oh, my friend! I have just seen poor Harry Maynard lying dead in his house—that pretty little cottage he furnished for his bride not two years ago—the blood oozing from a wound in his head, and the pistol still clutched in his lifeless hand."

"Harry Maynard! What could bring him to that?" for I had known him as a merry-hearted young fellow, the life of his set and a favorite with all who knew him.

"I say we have done it, Mrs. Christopher. It is the work of the fashionable girls and women of San Francisco. Lucy Maynard was one of us before her marriage. Could she bear to be our inferior in dress after she had entered into the prouder estate of wifehood? Could her husband, with his loving, generous heart—you know how devoted to her he has always been—bear to see her mortified or discontented? Yet his salary was not sufficient to supply the silks and laces and jewels she craved. You know he has been for years the confidential clerk of V—— Bros. The senior partner of the firm said to-day that they trusted him as they trusted themselves. He began eight months ago by appropriating small amounts, thinking he could replace them. Gradually the amounts grew larger, and finally, fearing discovery, he took a desperate step. Twenty thousand dollars came into his hands in advance of the time the remittance was expected by the firm, and he rashly invested it in stocks, thinking that inside of a week he would have the money back in his hands doubled. The market fell instead of rising, and this is the result! Oh, Mrs. Christopher, do you know last night was our grandest ball of the season. At the last moment Harry complained of a headache, and said he would not go, but insisted on sending Lucy off with a friend who had called to accompany them. There was not one on the floor more handsomely attired than Mrs. Maynard. She was radiant. Every one observed how well she looked. At 4 o'clock this morning she returned home to find that her splendor had been purchased at the cost of the life dearest to her on earth. He left behind him one pathetic note of farewell, in which he takes all the blame upon himself, and absolves her from reproach. But she sees at last the sin she has been living, and her despairing cries, her bitter self-reproach is ringing in my brain. From this moment on she is a wretched, broken woman.

It makes me despise, hate these things," and she gave the silken robe a vicious shake with her dainty-gloved hand. "Why don't we girls devote our lives to something better than this vain worship of dress, that is doing so much mischief? You needn't shake your head at me, Mrs. Christopher. You think an attempt at reformation would be useless. But I tell you that California girls have good, brave, generous souls under all the glitter, and it would only take the concerted action of a very few of our acknowledged leaders, and some direct, plain talk—oh, that I had the eloquence of a Cicero, to band us all together in a determined army, resisting extravagance in dress. Not to adopt any horrible uncouth uniform—I do not mean that—but to resolve to dress in simple, inexpensive materials, and wear for ornaments the beautiful floral jewels that nature furnishes us all the year round in California. If ever the day comes when we can accomplish this we shall have fewer absconding clerks, and stockbrokers, and bankers, and our eyes will no longer be tortured with the spectacle we now view on our streets every day, of poor, shop girls and apprentices attempting in their feeble way to imitate our dress, and becoming laughable, grotesque caricatures in consequence. Why, Mrs. Christopher"—and Clotilde's eyes sparkled—"if every woman in San Francisco should set aside, for two years, the money she spends for needless finery, we could rear temples prouder than those which graced ancient Athens. Art and literature could be fostered, and industries be established that would save from ruin and shame many a poor man and woman in our city. But if we go on as we are going now"—and the girl's eyes drooped—"we shall fall like Naples in her days of luxury, splendor, extravagance and profligacy."

MRS. CHRISTOPHER.

Two brothers living near Rondout were both suitors for the hand of the same lady. After having fought about her until both were badly punished, it transpired that she was already married and had a husband living. Tableau.

The criterion by which we judge others is apt to be more rigid than that by which we web ourselves to be judged. A glaring fault in another is only an excusable weakness in ourselves. Our eyes are wide open when we look at our neighbors, but wholly shut or partly closed when we look at our own lives. We may not be willing to do a positive wrong, but we are quite ready to look at our peccadilloes through the big end of the telescope, though we are sure to use the microscope when we investigate the sins of others.
