AN EXCITING ESCAPE.

Everybody has "experiences" more or less interesting. I had one in Cincinnati in the winter of 18[illegible], which was somewhat out of the usual order, and which will bear telling. I had gone there from Michigan with commendatory letters, which introduced me to prominent steamboat owners, who were operating floating property on the Ohio, Mississippi and Tennessee rivers. With one of these men I entered into a contract, by which I was to have a financial interest in a steamboat then building, and take the responsible position aboard of her as chief clerk.

Those southern steamboats—be it said to those who are familiar with steamboating on the great lakes—carry three and sometimes four clerks, and the position of chief clerk is that of cashier. In this position he has to handle large sums of money, as the boats in those trades advance considerable amounts of cash in the shape of "charges" on consignments of southern products—cotton, peanuts, tobacco, etc. I mention these things to show that the position I was to assume was one in which a dishonest man could misappropriate or embezzle large sums of money, and that I, being a stranger, was being taken largely upon trust.
