JENNIE BAXTER: JOURNALIST.

BY ROBERT BARR.

8—The Robbery in the Sleeping Car.

(CONTINUED.)

Jennie had promised Professor Bingford not to communicate with the editor of Pearson's Magazine regarding whether she would be breaking her word or not if she let that official know the result of her investigation when it could make no difference, one way or the other, to Professor Bingford. If Pearson's could have forwarded his article to the entire death, would he not, she asked herself, have preferred to make public all he knew of him, for had he not eminently succeeded then Jennie and the editor would have been in a pretty pickle, was what he worked for. Then there was the considerable of the chief of police was no longer a secret, Jennie had kept her promise to Bingford, and the secret of the police would go further than Pearson's Magazine, and in all probability the secret of the police would be revealed, yet a number of persons who had helped Jennie in her investigation would be further injured if the secret of the police was published. The chief of police was with Jennie, and he was a man who was not to be trifled with, and he was a man who was not to be trifled with, and he was a man who was not to be trifled with