MOLDERS OF DESTINY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

THE South African war will always be notable for the number of men who it brought to public view and, as unexpectedly as they came, to public view no more. Foremost among these men, of course, is the British commander in chief, Sir Redvers Buller. This man, who was a soldier, a politician, an adventurer, an athlete and most in the memories of all who served on the Nile and on English soil, was made a knight for attempting a great task, stage handed, shine a ridge of self early in the affairs of the Transvaal campaign. His first and exercise in the Indian mutiny. There he was under Roberts at Kandahar, where his great bravery and dash attracted the attention of his superior officer, who is also an Ironside. Later White took part in the three campaigns around Kabul, Ghuznee, Sabbri Mark and Charikar in Afghanistan. The war
