A CosmopolitAn SCHOOL.

A Great Mixture of Children in One of New York's Big School Buildings.

Until about a year ago the attendance of each school No. 35, New York, was not English. Not a score or so of pupils, but all the children of one district together over the average collection of races from the ends of the earth. A year ago a change was made and the Italian, Jewish and the Irish, Scotch and the Russian part of the north Europe which the parents of each of the pupils had come. He found that there were in his school no less than twenty-seven different nationalities, speaking about twenty-five languages other than English and its dialects. He found that of these scholars very few in the primary department about 50 per cent attended the school regularly. A certain place in the programme each child arose, holding in his or her hands one flag. One was the American flag, the other the flag of the nation from which the father had come. The children in the school were established. Two recognized half a dozen languages as the tongues of European nations—Italian, German, Spanish, French, Polish and the Irish. Then they are nearly a dozen others, recognizable from their dress and colors and features as the tongues of barbaric or semi-barbaric countries, known to us in a vague way as heathen.

When these children come being under five years of age, first come to the school they are foreigners in the very core. They speak the language of their fathers, and perhaps have never even heard the sound of an English word. They are of the country from which their parents come both in customs and speech. Their clothing alone bears the stamp of America, but that soon is gone with their fame and expression that they seem that one and even more poorly clad than they really are. They enter the primary department. And here it may be said that although the youngest are five years old, the age of many extend upward toward eighteen and twenty years.

It is the business of Miss Rose O'Neill and her seven aids, who to teach these children the English language, and then to make them a fair English school. Of the five hundred children who have entered the school at the beginning of the school year, and you will think the task hopeless impossible. Come back at the end of six months, and if you close your eyes and listen to the reading exercises you will not be able to tell the English Chinese child or Arab child or Tuscan child from the few pure blood of Americans who form the contingent of the school. Then you will wonder how the school has been performed.—Harper's Weekly.

Estimate Of Silver in High Lands.

We are too ready to depart somewhat in millions from the truth and on a low plane, but the truth is always beautifully dwell in the latitude of the infinite. Matters of policy, of vanity, of sending instead of being right, enter into our sums from out, shall poison the lives of the little ones at the fireside, or cause the ruin of a nation. Let the truth be spoken, and the poisons of falsehood, of self-interest
