TO PRODUCE A GOOD DRIVER,

Qualities That Go to the Making of the Family Horse.

My conception of a family horse is one weighing from 1,100 to 1,200 pounds, handsome, any color but gray, with not too much white in the face or on the legs; of a nervous temperament, and of an absolutely fearless disposition; sturdy main, with wide, flat legs; as light in bone as can be, and not have the bone suggestive of weakness; good, tough feet, not too round, and above all, not in the least flat. It should have a good, open, free gait, but not at all big gaited; a fast walker and perfectly gentle for any one to drive that has had a fair amount of experience in such capacity. How to get such a horse and how to bring him to this condition is the question. The old fashioned Morgan horse possessed all these qualifications except size. There are Morgans today that have sire with the other qualities. These qualities are the rule with the Morgans. I know of no other firmly that possess them except in rare individual cases. Therefore I would select the mare from which I expected to produce three from the Morgan family.

Many readers will undoubtedly take issue with me for selecting a horse of a nervous disposition for a family horse. A wide experience of my own and a close observation of the horses about me have taught me that the horse of the mild, easy disposition lacks courage not only to keep up a stiff road gait, but to obey his driver in the face of terrifying objects and in cases of breakdowns. I have a Morgan mare so nervous that she will jump clear off the ground if a firecracker explodes or the exhaust steam from a locomotive goes off near by, yet she will stand at the station unhitched when the cars are moving about and locomotives blowing off, and has never betrayed the trust we have placed in her. My wife and children drive her with safety.

After securing the brood mare from which to raise family horses too careful a selection cannot be made of a horse to which to breed her. Of course the qualities we wish to perpetuate must be possessed by the sire if the progeny is to come up to our expectations. After the mare is safe in foal my way would be to use her just the same as though she were not. Any decent man would not overdrive or neglect any good horse, more particularly a mare in foal. The chance for injury are so small that I say use her just as if not in foal for three reasons—first, because the foal will be more intelligent just in proportion as the dam comes in contact with intelligent people. If any reader doubts this, I am ready to discuss this question, but it would be out of place here; second, because the foal will be stronger and more healthy if the dam has regular work, with plenty of muscle and bone forming food; third, because it will lessen the first cost of the colt if you do not have to charge him with the cost of keeping his dam in idleness.—C. A. Chapman in Rural New Yorker.

It has been suggested that the barn winter school of the southwest is developing annually by becoming softer, and that on this account it may be expedient to import new hard winter wheat seed from Russia.
