OCEAN DERELICTS.

IT USED TO BE A PASSION, BUT NOW IT IS ONE OF HORROR TO THEM.

[Pittsburg Dispatch.]

"I don't know what to make of the reports I frequently read in the papers about derelicts being located at sea and then reported as being so long since that and instance that, when the skipper who sees the hulking gear to port," said Captain Ernest Clarke the other day. He is seventy-nine years old, or will be on October 2, and up to twelve years ago had followed the sea for a livelihood ever since he could remember. He is on his way to spend his summer vacation, as he calls it, with his daughter near Staunton, Va., and was at last Mr. James.

"That kind of prevailing sounds mighty singular to me. I have sailed on every sea in the world, in all kinds of vessels, and thirty years of that time I was a skipper. Once, when I was very young, and sailing with my uncle on the Martha Adams, which ran in the sugar trade from Boston to Demerara, we ran into a waterlogged wreck and pretty high went to the bottom. My uncle knew a dozen vessels had passed that wreck inside he reached it and he cutted their skippers for all he was worth for not having set it a fire or sank it.

"In all my time I never came up with an abandoned wreck, or what they called derelicts nowadays, without either giving it a good one of oil or running an auger through the bottom. It use to be just as much a skipper's duty to remove a wreck from the track of navigation as it was for a farmer to move the rocks and stumps out of his house road. Nowadays the derelicts seem to be a matter of curiosity, and sensating people let 'em alone and report their whereabouts, as some people can tell great stories of how far the thing has floated since it was last seen."

"Wouldn't a fine time for stopping to stick or burn a derelict?"

"No, not enough to count. It would take two hours to leave it, stand to a derelict for all time to come and get wide of full head way again, and the benefits of navigation would more than make up for such little delay a million times over. I saw the other day where one of those wrecks had turned around the Atlantic some thing like 10,000 miles and had been reported numerous times, and boarded and examined at that twenty. Any skipper who goes on a derelict and examines and then leaves it to threaten every vessel that comes along that way is guilty in my opinion, of criminal negligence. We old-timers never failed to sink or burn 'em, and that's what ought to be done nowadays."

How to Save Souls.

Reaching the soul through the teeth! Humane stunt, does it not? We know that our Lord was most successful in reaching a man's soul through his body—that is, by clothing or feeding him. But this is a new way. A medical missionary of China confidently believes that the honor is all later case take a Chinaman's heart, and a molar opens into the very innermost soul. The go-between is a pair of steel forceps. The step to conversion are firm grasp on the clenching tooth, a twist of the wrist, a tooth gone, a cry, and the "heathen Chinee" surrenders with all his gods. In other words, Dr. Mackey, a missionary, claims that he drew 20,000 teeth during his labors among the Chinese in Formosa, and had 15,000 converts. It is missionary work of a practical kind to a Chinaman it is not an easy matter to reach him spiritually.
