Mr. Van Bibber and the other men of his particular set were grouped around the club window after luncheon, or breakfast, as it happened to be, when Van Bibber said he thought seriously of entering upon a career of crime. Van Bibber was given to making disturbing statements of this sort, which required one to think, even if one did not reply to them, and the other men rather wished he would not.

"For instance," said young Van Bibber, "I went to a dance last night, and the room where you were to put your hat was filled with old silver, little bits of it—snuff boxes and spectacle cases and bonbon boxes and buckles and girdles. I had a good mind to fill my overcoat with half of 'em, and then I thought it would be much more fun to fill every other man's pockets, and wait and see the row, but some one came in, and I couldn't do it. Now, there are those teas and receptions and days and all that sort of thing that women go to. Why shouldn't I start out some afternoon and sweep the place bare, and melt the silver down and get rich? I might become a sort of 'Jack the Ripper' or 'Louis the Lifter.' I'll bet," ...
