ARGUMENT RESUMED.

The Second Day's Hearing of the Income Tax Cases.

REASONING OF HORSON AND PHELPS.

An Explained by Ex. Railway—Attorney General Olney Urges the Reconsideration of the Decision.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 7.—The second day's discussion of the income tax cases in the Supreme Court today began with Assistant Attorney General Maxwell in the defense. He argued for a reversal of the former opinion of the court on the question of the validity of the federal tax on incomes derived from rents. All the seats on the bench were again occupied today as yesterday and visitors crowded the court room. Without quoting from the decisions cited, which he had presented yesterday, and he was always from the printed, but he had already gone closer to the case the question to be decided. He quoted from the decisions clearly and strong here as to the meaning of "income" and phrases used in taxation. He argued that the decision of the court in the case of the income tax was not in the nature of a judicial decision, but was a mere opinion, and was not a decision of the court. He argued that the decision of the court was not a decision of the court, but was an
