BEREAVED.

Let me come to where you sit weeping—sit,
Let me, who have not any right to do,
Who have not any right to do,
Weep with you for the little one whom here
I have known nothing of.

The little arms that slowly, slowly bound
Their treasure round your neck—the hands you
Dare not, dare not, such hands I never knew;
Why I not weep with you?

Pain would I be of service—my sore thing
Behind the tears that would be comforting;
But ah! is no better than rousing up a
Who have no child to die.

—Jerome Walkbrook Riley in Century.

THE SHIP WENT DOWN.

A beautiful story has come to me. A story beautiful in its sadness, its love, its and its devotion; a story which brings into the presaic Nineteenth century a glimpse of that romanticism, chivalry and sacrificial love supposed to belong so peculiarly to the crude and romantic mediæval times. Forty years ago the incidents which I will try to narrate in the words of another happened.

This other, an old Englishman, is now a man with silvered locks and sweeping beard. In his younger days he was a midshipman in the navy of Great Britain.

He also was something of an amateur artist, and after leaving the navy service came to this country. While only a lad I was a favorite of his, and for long hours I would sit upon his knee or beside him on a low footstool and listen to his tales of the sea, and my youthful heart would be fired, and I would determine a sailor to be. We would sit together in the winter evenings, with no light save the firelight, now a shadow on the wall, then flickering strong and bright. There was a picture over the mantel, a picture which showed the crude hand of the amateur, yet was strong. It had been his last and best effort. It was a representation of the finale of the story which he told me. The picture, or rather the woman's face in the picture, had, young as I was, made a strong impression upon me. It was not the beauty of the face that made the excellence of the picture; it was not the scene that so affected me.

He said she was beautiful. If so he failed in portraying her physical beauty. But the expression of that face, the intangible, spiritual something that seemed to emanate from and hover around and about it was marvelous, and made of the ordinary picture a master stroke and caused up all the debaters as charity covereth a multitude of sins. The face, radiantly happy, and a portion of the throat alone were visible, and that face was sinking, sinking, even now, below the surface of the ocean to be lost forever, and yet a glory shone upon it as if the first beam from the opening gate of heaven was shining there; and she was young and rich and had position. The sea was a sea of glass, and there was no "painted ship upon that painted ocean." Close in a strong man's arm she was held, and her face rested against his, which was not so distinct as was her own.

Many a time I had asked for the story of that picture, and my friend would not tell it me, for it saddened him, and he thought I was too young to comprehend and sympathize with the spirit of the story. But last week, when on a visit east, I met him for the first time in years, and strange it seems before that picture he told me the story.

"As you know, I was a middy in her majesty's service. It was my third year on the ocean wave, and I and my friend and grubber, Jack Sutherland, the second lieutenant, had just reported to the Golconda for service. The Golconda was to sail the next day for India.

"Jack Sutherland was some years older than I, and as we had both come from the same neighborhood he had constituted himself my protector. In my young eyes he was invested with all possible manly qualities and accomplishments, and I loved him as only a young boy can love and adulate a young man who is not only his friend and adviser, but his idol as well. But everybody on board loved Jack, from the lowest sailor to the captain, always kind, courteous, amiable and manly. And he was strong and handsome, too. Was it any wonder then that Nellie Westinghouse loved him?

"Miss Westinghouse came on board early on the morning of the day on which we sailed. She was the daughter of the viceroy of India. Her school days in England were just completed, and she was to join her father and his family in India. She was tall and rather slender, with a form of loveliness and grace. Her hair was raven black, and her eyes large and blue, while open to their innermost recesses, features that were perfect, a complexion of dazzling whiteness, and a voice that had all the melody of music. If there is anything in the affinity of persons and souls, these two seemed certainly intended for each other.

"The anchor was lifted, the vessel sailed away, and the cliffs of old England sank down upon the horizon and disappeared. It was at dinner, the first day out, that Miss Westinghouse and Lieut. Sutherland met. A long voyage was before us, and as a large and gay party was on board, the evenings were spent in delightful entertainments; but each, as is nearly always the case, certain affiliations of persons and sets were established. The decided preference exhibited for each other's company by Miss Westinghouse and Lieut. Sutherland soon became a matter of remark, and a pointed source of uneasiness to Maj. and Mrs. Bromley, in whose charge Miss Westinghouse was sailing—and to the captain of the ship, who was warmly attached to Jack.

"Sir John Westinghouse, the father of Miss Nellie, was a proud, cold man, and would never have sanctioned any attentions paid to his daughter by a penniless lieutenant in the service. He was too proud of his race and name; his position and his gold. Mrs. Bromley spoke warningly to Nellie, and Capt. Richards more than once spoke to Jack of the almost insuperable obstacles to his union with the daughter of Sir John Westinghouse. He told him that the end of this voyage would be the end of all, and that two hearts, saddened and miserable, would be torn asunder to go their separate ways. But since the birth of time what two people in love ever heeded the advice of another? If they did they were not in love.

"They loved, as they felt themselves, with a love that was more than love and which each recognized that they would be separated at the end of the voyage, they resolved to blind themselves to that awful thought, and, like fools, revel with all life in the brief happiness allotted them. They would live alone in the present, which was so intensely bright, that it hid the blackness of the future. The days were on, the hours grew stronger and the stately ship sailed like a swan over the undulating glassiness of the sea. Happy hearts were on board that ship.

"The hours lengthened between them and England and the hours of love grew shorter. In just one week they would be in Bombay, and she would go from him, and at the thought they loved still more fondly and sipped the shortening cup of sweetness, which now began to have, perhaps, a tincture of bitterness unutterable.

"We were three days out from Bombay. It was a glorious morning, a stiff breeze was blowing, and the sea as it rose and fell, long and even and deep, was in its reflected glory that almost equaled the sun itself. The bells had hardly ceased tapping when Jack came on deck. He thought the ship had a lurching, lingering motion that was unusual. It kept increasing, and soon the cry of "A leak! A leak!" was heard. Jack gave a few hurried orders, and the sailors and carpenters went to work with a will. The ship heeled heavily now and was visibly sinking. The hammering in the hold continually jarred above the noise on deck, but the old ship was sinking fast.

"Jack's duties called him everywhere. The boats were lowered and all the lines and passengers ordered in. Jack saw Nellie for an instant and kissed her a passionate good-by. In the hurry and confusion Nellie and Mrs. Bromley were separated. In fact, Mrs. Bromley in her terror, never thought of Nellie until her boat was far away from the sinking ship, and waited patiently for the arrival of the other boats confident of seeing Nellie there.

"All the boats and all the passengers were safe save Nellie. The soldiers and sailors, mariners as they were, were drawn up in line, not forsaking their duties, as they and it slowly sank. Grim, without an evidence of terror, stood the brave fellows. Jack was looking out over the sea toward the boats, trying in the moment of death to get one last glimpse of his love. The ship was shivering now and sinking fast.

"'Jack!'

"Every one turned, and there stood Nellie, dressed in white, pale as an angel, and seemed a visitor from heaven come to guide them home. She glided across the deck, a radiant smile was upon her face, her arms were extended to her lover. He took her without a word, pressed a kiss upon her forehead and held her close, and still the radiance of unseen things was upon her face raised so lovingly to his.

* * * * * *

"The ship went down. While struggling in the water a rafter came to us, and I clung to it. I looked around and on the crest of a wave being borne toward me were Nellie and Jack, as you see them there. Her face was raised to heaven and his, and all the happiness of angels was depicted there, and—then the waters—came over them and"——

My friend's eyes were wet with tears, and I had heard the story.—Cecil Hastings in Omaha World-Herald.

The Peck Over Bank.

Did you ever hear of the Peck Over bank? There is a peculiar story connected with the title of the institution. The Peck Over bank, which at the time of the South sea trouble had another name, was located on Lombard street, in Baltimore. It was a conservative institution, as it is now, and when the bubble burst nobly withstood the run upon its resources. When every claimant had been paid in full the cashier found that he had a quantity of specie still on hand. He was an enterprising fellow and saw a chance for an advertisement. He procured a peck measure, and filling it up with golden guineas placed it in the window of the bank to notify passers-by that that institution, at least, was all right.

When the directors met the next morning they showed their appreciation of the cashier's idea by promptly changing the name of the bank to the "Peck Over bank," which title it bears to this day.—Interview in Pittsburg Dispatch.

The Thrifty Oatmeal King.

A short, nervous German stepped up to the Auditorium register the other day and ornamented it with the name E. Schumacher. While he did so a lobby lounger gave to the club man these facts concerning the well known "oatmeal king" and Prohibition leader. Mr. Schumacher is a millionaire, earned by his own exertions. He daily work is indicated by a remark made in a recent interview upon the eight hour work day: "I believe in it, for I've always worked on the eight hour system myself—eight hours before lunch and eight hours afterward." He dresses very plainly. His suits dress faultlessly, and they have often tried to get the old gentleman himself to pay a little more attention to matters of dress, but they have failed.—Chicago Mail.

As Sung by a Cassia.

Mrs. Henry M. Stanley when Miss Dorothy Tennant was almost the first lady in London to practice "slumming," the end to befriend little street vagabonds, and reward them for good behavior by teaching them to play familiar airs with one finger on her piano, and sing them to an accompaniment. Her relates of her experiments with much delight, that one young gutterscipe was heard to render "Rule, Britannia! Britannia rules the wave" as follows:

Rule, Brittania!
Brittania rules the shaves.
The naybers frightened
Runne, runne away to cave.

Oysters with False Teeth.

Mr. William H. Deane, an oysterman, exhibits quite a curiosity which he took from New River, near Cedar Point, in Onslow county. It is two oysters fastened together at right angles with a set of false teeth adhering to them at the intersection of the shells. The upper roof of the teeth is next to the shell, while the teeth are pointed outward.

The teeth and gums are in a perfect state of preservation, although it is conceived that they must have been in the bottom of the river for many years. We are told by oystermen that the oysters to which they are attached are of about three years' growth, and a dentist tells us that the teeth are of a style made about thirty years ago, although a few of the same style are yet made by some dentists.—Wilmington Messenger.
