WHERE IS PATRIOTISM?

The strike of the trolley car men in Brooklyn cannot fail to impress the public with the truly deplorable relations existing at present between labor and capital. On account of some grievance a few of the employes had, or at least thought they had, against their employers, the whole force of men, estimated at 5,000, simultaneously quit work. By so doing they embarrassed thousands of laborers who were dependent on the cars for their arrival in time at their various places of work, causing incalculable loss in various ways to numerous persons not in the least interested in the dispute. Besides, the taxpayers had to stand the expense of the maintenance of troops for a number of days. It is not too much to say, that because the "trippers" in the service of the Brooklyn car companies were dissatisfied with their earnings, the general public had to loose a million dollars. The enormity of such a condition is simply monstrous.

But it reveals a fact serious enough to cause everybody to pause. It shows that capital and labor stand against each other ready to fight to death for the fruit produced by the combined efforts of both. This country, it seems, although rich in resources and blessed above all the earth in many respects, can no longer give its toiling sons employment at adequate remuneration. Employers and employes have been, for some cause or other, reduced to the necessity of [illegible] other in [illegible] mortal combat—one to avoid [illegible] wages and financial ruin; the other to be saved from reduction of wages and starvation. That this is the cold, cruel fact cannot be denied.

Is there, then, no remedy? Is there no man in this country who is able to penetrate to the sources of the evil threatening the nation, and who has influence enough to make himself heard, combined with the needed unselfish patriotism? A great deal is said about "duty to party," but there are emergencies when higher duties call, and this seems to be one. If it is true that the financial condition has been brought about mainly by erroneous legislation, all parties ought to unite in a speedy correction of the wrong. If, on the other hand, the condition is due to other sources, it is time for the leading men of all parties to unite in efforts to find a remedy. The people demand this with no uncertain voice, and that demand cannot be ignored with safety.

GRAVE OF THOMAS FORD.

Thomas Ford was governor of Illinois in 1844—a fact deeply impressed upon the minds of the majority of the people of Utah. As governor he pledged his honor and the good faith of his state that when the Prophet Joseph and the Patriarch Hyrum were taken to Carthage jail they would be protected from the mob violence which it was known would be directed against them. It is a matter of history now that pledge was lightly disregarded, and as a result two of the servants of the Lord were murdered. Governor Ford sank from the exalted position in which he had been held, and finally his body found its last earthly abode in Springdale cemetery, at Peoria, Illinois.

Last week an Illinois public man at the state capitol commented on the neglect shown to the grave of one who once was governor of the state, and the Peoria Journal takes up the subject, describing how the ex-governor's grave, as well as the whole lot in which lie his wife and [illegible] daughter, is uncared for. [illegible] all around it the grass has been [illegible] [illegible], and every lot in the vicinity has been kept in good order, but not a single [illegible] has been bestowed upon the lot sacred to the memory of a former governor of the great state of Illinois. The comment [illegible] that an [illegible] has been given them for the purpose, and neither state nor city, nor any private citizen [illegible], has furnished any money. About [illegible] is required as a fund to keep the lot in order. Occasionally there has been talk of raising a subscription for the purpose from the old town of Peoria, but nobody has taken the initiative. Occasionally it has been proposed to secure an appropriation from the legislature, but no one has felt sufficiently interested to take the matter in charge.

The statement is made that it is proposed to secure such an appropriation at this session, but that meanwhile the cemetery authorities have remained inactive, and have steadfastly refused to bestow any care or work upon the lot. Weeds, tall grass and briars have luxuriated thick and rank within the entire lot to an extent that requires it circumstance to walk about in it. Around the lot has grown a high thick hedge of evergreen from ten to fifteen feet high, irregular and unkempt—never trimmed. Evergreen trees, higher than the hedge, stand on each side of the entrance. A still taller evergreen spreads its branches wide at the rear of the lot. From some points a view of the top of the monument, erected by the state at a cost of [illegible], can be obtained, but elsewhere nothing within the hedge is visible. Few people who drive or stroll along the avenue are aware that the remains of a former governor of Illinois repose there. In such neglect have the people of Peoria allowed Thomas Ford's grave to remain.

This situation is pointed out as a reproach to the residents of the city in which reposes the body of the deceased. There must be, however, a cause, perhaps easily ascertainable, for this seemingly general feeling of utter disregard for one who half a century ago was honored with the position of the first citizen in the state. With other public men, some of whom have not attained to the high position of state governor, but rare mention of the fact that there is a disposition toward neglect arouses a love and patriotism which quickly remove every cause of complaint. But with Governor Ford it seems to be different; and the reason must be sought in the fact that there is a public sentiment, perhaps not to be framed in words, but yet existing in the more impressive form of action, or inaction, which says that the neglect has been shown because its subject was unworthy of greater consideration than that which has been bestowed.

While there is much of fault to be attributed to the people of this country generally, it cannot be said that they are deliberately ungrateful to their public men; but where those men fail [illegible] their love, esteem and confidence, or, when weighed in the balances of justice are found wanting, even when their variance from the right has been in response to popular clamor, it is not long before the people [illegible] toward them a stolid indifference that is impervious to patriotic influence that appeals to the sublime [illegible] and love, shine forth with [illegible] these did not. Possibly the [illegible] unvarying unfitness, apart [illegible] absence of love and reverence [illegible] manifested in Illinois toward Thomas Ford's memory is not a result of his having failed to preserve the official honor of his state in a supreme moment; but that they are absent is undeniable, and the neglect of the grave of the seventh governor of Illinois is one of the evidences of that fact.

WILHELM'S CELEBRATION.

Emperor William has celebrated the thirty-eighth anniversary of his birth. The day was the occasion of much display throughout the empire. By a special imperial order the city of Berlin was decorated "as a token of gratitude to the memory of the glorious past of the Fatherland." Marble statues of the princes of Brandenburg and Prussia and other distinguished men were ordered erected in the Thiergarten, and the army was favored with one of those peculiar manifestoes for which the emperor has already gained distinction. In this he "glorifies the mercy of the Almighty" for the victory won twenty-five years ago over the French, and adds:

To this end I exhort, in order to grant the troops a visible symbol of their proud memories, that from April [illegible] to May [illegible], [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]
William II., Rex.

It is quite evident that Germany's young emperor, in his present conflict with the troublesome elements that surround him on every side, supposes that one way out of the situation is to [illegible] as high as possible the pomp [illegible] of the past and from this imaginary [illegible] endeavor to make an impression in favor of imperialism. No other explanation can readily be found [illegible] of the fact that he, whenever possible, emphasizes his own ego, as if forty-five millions in Germany, or more, were but an insignificant matter compared to himself. It is therefore not the German army but "my troops," "my army" "—me" and "mine" first and last.

Probably no course can be more detrimental to the interest he would [illegible] that William, Bismarck and [illegible] labored in German harmony. Napoleon during the Egyptian campaign [illegible] it is said, by [illegible] Pompey's pillar at Alexandria and [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] this age of democratic [illegible], [illegible] the people are [illegible] in their interests and aspirations. The opposite course may easily prove a failure.

Emperor William, we believe, takes [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] known for expecting that are [illegible] him by others. He appeared at [illegible] in a [illegible] when Sweden was nearly [illegible]. The Russians invaded Poland and devastated the country. Other European powers threatened to attack the kingdom. The king neglected to send troops and ships to the points of danger, but answered valiant challenges on his adversaries and eulogies of the past on his soldiers. And at last he sent for the armor of the [illegible] Charles XII. and put it on, marching up and down one of the halls of his palace, thus equipped. To his attendants he expressed the opinion that Europe would tremble on learning that he had donned the armor of the "lion" hero of the North. But Europe did not tremble. Everybody laughed at him, and his subjects joined in the merriment, and when they had composed themselves they declared him insane and drove him from the throne, him and his heirs forever.

The German emperor has no external enemies to conquer at present but antagonistic forces at work among his own people. These can certainly not be brought to submission by the ruler donning the armor of his grandfather. Nor do the interests of Germany require that everything that asks for due consideration of the rights of the people should be put down. What Germany needs is a sovereign who understands the present and can grasp the future and is willing to co-operate with those who desire a peaceful advance towards freedom.

Just now there is a plethora of advice from would-be health counselors, who are advocating and urging "hot baths" and "cold baths" as absolutely essential to human health and longevity. Therefore it is timely to suggest to the people that their physical welfare makes it necessary for them to be careful in following recommendations from enthusiasts or cranks, or in running after "fads" of any kind. It is well to remember in the bathing business that "cold" does not mean cool, and "hot" is not necessarily warm; also that it is quite unsafe to step in either direction to extreme [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] dangerous results. [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] safer [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the people [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] "temperate in all things," and accepting the temperature of the water in which they bathe.

In this last issue of Washington, Kate Field asks, "Is Intolerance Dead?" We would interpose a decided "No!" in reply, so long as Miss Field maintains her present attitude toward certain people with whom we are proud to claim acquaintance. We presume that even the lady would not disagree with us, for in responding to the inquiry herself she says: "Nevertheless, intolerance is one of our besetting sins, North and South, taking different forms in different sections, and making life a burden to enlightened men and women who set the best of examples by minding their own business." We are pleased to note this open confession as indicating a possible repentance and an [illegible] to be so prevailing.

AN OPINION GIVEN.

Recently Mr. J. D. Thomas, of North Dakota, visited the Shenandoah Valley, Virginia, and after carefully examining the country located in Winchester, he writes to Mr. V. Richards, Land and Immigration Agent, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Baltimore, Maryland, as follows: "I have been in nearly every state and territory of the United States, and am frank in my opinion that this valley surpasses all other sections in the Union. The lands are low in price, and produce profitable crops. I thank you for directing me here, and solicit those seeking pleasant and profitable homes to locate in this country."
