Moral Courage in Municipal Affairs.

The number of men who are willing to accept office is innumerable; the number who are willing to perform the duties imposed by said office is very few. The profuse promises of men, while candidates, are equalled only by their entire disregard of them when elected. When men enter upon the duties of a public position, they take an oath to faithfully execute the laws or ordinances of the city. A willful failure to do so amounts to little less than perjury. It is an open violation of a solemn oath, and this is simple perjury. How many men when they seek public position and make oath to perform the duties realize the responsibility they are assuming. Their minds are so full of the honor and glory they have achieved, that they seldom think that that is the least part which they have to perform. The oath and the fulfilment of the obligations imposed by it play apparently a very small part in their estimate of what they have to do. Now, in the coming municipal election, we need men who will do what they take oath they will; not men who promise and stop at the promising. We want men who have the moral courage to do their duty, and not with admirable facility for inventing excuses for a non-enforcement of the ordinances. The plausible gentlemen, plausible in pointing out their own excellence, plausible in apologizing for failures to do their sworn duty, plausible in demonstrating the defects of the ordinances, have no business in public position in Denver. We have had too many of them in the past; we need no more of them in the future. The first essential of the man who receives the popular suffrage should be moral courage. Possessed of this quality he is certain to be honest, and most probably capable. It does not require a very smart man to enforce the laws. A person of medium abilities, who is able to read the statutes or ordinances, and who can see when they are violated, is sufficient for all practical purposes. Read the city ordinances,—what are they passed for? Are they not just, and wholesome, and proper, and calculated to preserve the peace, and good order, and safety and morals of the community? We elect men to enforce these ordinances; do they do it? Run back over the last half dozen city administrations, including the present one, and see how many of the ordinances have been dead letters. Either let these ordinances be repealed, or else let us elect men to office who will enforce them. If any present candidate proposes to make any mental reservation when he takes his oath of office, and to execute certain ordinances which he will not enforce, let him announce the fact beforehand, and furnish the people with a list of them. The men who will enforce the most of them, or all of them, are the men we are anxious to support in the ensuing election. We do not care about men who will promise only; promises are cheap things. The man with the moral courage to do, to act, to fulfil sworn obligations, is the man Denver needs. Such men are few and far between—they are never "available" candidates. Those who stand up for the right, for law, and the duties imposed by laws, always have enemies. But if such men can be found in the city, let us bring them out and elect them. We cannot always tell what men are until we try them; but if we choose wisely, there will be no just cause to complain of broken ordinances and violated laws. Elect men with moral courage, and a great victory will be gained for the cause of law and order, and public morality.—Denver News.

The trouble in Utah is not that our municipal and other local officials are unwilling to do their duty, but they are judicially prevented from putting good laws and ordinances into force, and the criminal classes reap the benefit.

How the Girl of the Period Acts in the Horse Cars.

She stands upon the curb, with a little springy, up-and-down motion, as if she had spiral springs in the soles of her gaiters. As the car approaches, she sticks the point of her clean parasol in the direction of the driver, with a small jerk. The car stops. She gives one or two little motions, before she leaves the pavement, and then dances to the car. As she ascends the step, the conductor seems to consider it absolutely necessary to her safety to place one of his hands in the small of her back, while he rings the bell with the other. She enters the car with the spiral springs still bobbing her up and down; and as the seats are all full, she stands holding her hands in front of her, and gazing off into illimitable space, as if the one idea which never entered her mind, and which never could enter it under any possible circumstances, is, that some man will rise and offer her his seat. But a young man in the corner does rise, and immediately the fellow next to him moves quickly into the corner, as if that maneuver had formed the subject of anxious thought during many years of his life.

When the young man rises, the young lady suddenly becomes conscious that there is something nearer to her than the horizon, and she gives two or more little bounces, and says:

"Keep your seat."

The young man is embarrassed, and says he is going to get out soon, whereupon the fair lady dances toward the seat, sinks into it, and pretends that the fact of the existence of any young man who occupied that seat, and who is going to get out, has entirely faded out of her consciousness. She smoothes her dress, and its supplemental frippery, flounces, and pennants, and again looks far beyond the confines of the car into emptiness. She knows she is expected by the other women to remain unconscious of their presence while they study her clothes. They immediately begin. They stare at her dress, her sacque, her hat, her back hair, her jewelry, her gloves, her boys and ribbons, and her miscellaneous millinery, until the entire costume is photographed in their memories, and the prices estimated, and a critical opinion formed, with a resolution to have a bonnet of the same kind, or a "body" cut upon the same pattern.

When the young lady thinks that this examination is concluded, she becomes conscious again and begins to look around and see how all the other women are dressed. She examines each one in detail, and in a few moments she is in possession of all the necessary information. Presently a young man with whom she is acquainted gets into the car, and he stands clutching the strap, and trying in vain to keep himself in a graceful attitude while he converses with her. All the women begin to wonder whether she cares particularly for him—and, as she knows their thoughts she is as distant that the young man becomes more embarrassed than ever, and makes renewed attempts to maintain a graceful position.

When she wishes to get out she rises, smoothes down her frippery again, indulges in two or three springs, and dances along to the platform. The conductor again considers it imperatively necessary to press the small of her back. She dances down the steps, dances to the pavement, and then dances along the street, fully aware of the fact that the women in the car have all turned round to look at her, and serenely confident in the assurance that she had on good clothes, which fit her splendidly. As she disappears, the conductor turns to the man who is smoking a cigar on the platform, and remarks that she is a "crusher."—Ex.
