Washington's "Finest."

Here and there in the halls and corridors of the capital the sturdy guardians of the public peace, clad in immaculate uniforms all, silent and indifferent, ruminating, to judge from the slow and regular action of their jaws, upon the destinies of the nation, though eating for none of these things. Fine specimens most of them are, too—broad shouldered, healthy skinned, fair, quiet men, whose solid nerves nothing could surprise, whose firm but gentle mastication on political convulsion could retard. They are of a very different type from the burly New York policeman.

One can hardly believe that they are really colleagues of the colored functionary in stellar blue cloth and brass buttons, who stands in all his glory at the corner of Pennsylvania avenue, now north of all to surveys, whose slightest gesture could stop even a cable car and whose lofty stature and speckless clothes call forth the admiration of the colored nursery maid and can impose good behavior even upon fair haired little boys and make the saucy faced, blue eyed "toughs" look a little less as though they had bought the pavement for their own convenience and would refuse to let it even at a high price.—Marion Crawford in Century.

Worthy a Place In American Gardens.

Professor L. H. Bailey of the Cornell university experiment station devotes a bulletin to the description of various garden vegetables that have been introduced by the Chinese, some of which are worthy of our adoption. The best known and perhaps the most valuable of these new vegetables is the pe-tsai, or so called Chinese cabbage. This plant bears a loose, lettuce like head of crisp leaves, which may be used in all the fashions in which cabbage is served. This plant requires a cool and moist soil in which to make its best growth. It is essentially an autumn vegetable. The Chinese wanted to an excellent plant for greens and produces an enormous amount of herbage. Its culture demands the more attention as that advised for pe-tsai.

California pepper grass appears to be a finely cut leafed form of a mustard long known in old gardens, but not described either in American botanies or gardening books. It is one of the best of all plants for early spring greens. Although the species is cultivated in China and Japan, it does not appear to have been independently introduced from these countries in recent years. It is not known how or when the plant first came to this country. Other noteworthy plants recently introduced from China are the pak-choi, used as greens and for the white, thick leaf stalks, and the tuberous rooted mustard, grown for its small turnip like roots. These plants possess less merit for American gardens than the foregoing species.

Of the various cucurbitae plants introduced by the Chinese the best is probably the wax gourd or sit-kwa. The fruit of this is excellent for conserves. The plant is of easy culture, but requires a long season.

The la-wah or momordica has some merit as a curiosity and an ornamental vine than as an analogue for American forms. The Japanese use the American root trade. The luffas or dish cloth gourds of the gardens are of two species which differ chiefly in the contour of the fruits. The consumer species in this country has ribbed cylindrical fruits, but the one chiefly grown by the Chinese about New York has club shaped ribbed fruits. These fruits are interesting to us chiefly as a curiosity and as yielding a spongelike fiber which is useful for household purposes. The Chinese yam has little to recommend it to American gardeners. The Chinese bean or ton-kok is no doubt a valuable vegetable for late home use.

Tissel Noise.

The Marguerite carnations are particularly desirable on account of being summer and autumn blossoms.

The object of pruning roses is to keep up a supply of new wood, since the flowers are borne only on the wood of current season's growth.

Vick's Caprice is a marvel among roses, with its bright pink color, interspersed and blended with beautiful shades of pure white.

The white single dahlias are excellent for cut flowers.

Although pansies will "last forever" in the same place without transplanting, the best results are obtained by moving them to fresh ground every few years.

Florists get the enormous blossoms of chrysanthemums we see with them in November by disbudding—that is, picking off all of the buds except one to a shoot, doing this as soon as the buds can be discerned. And the same sort of disbudding is now being practiced by the florists in the case of roses and carnations under glass.
