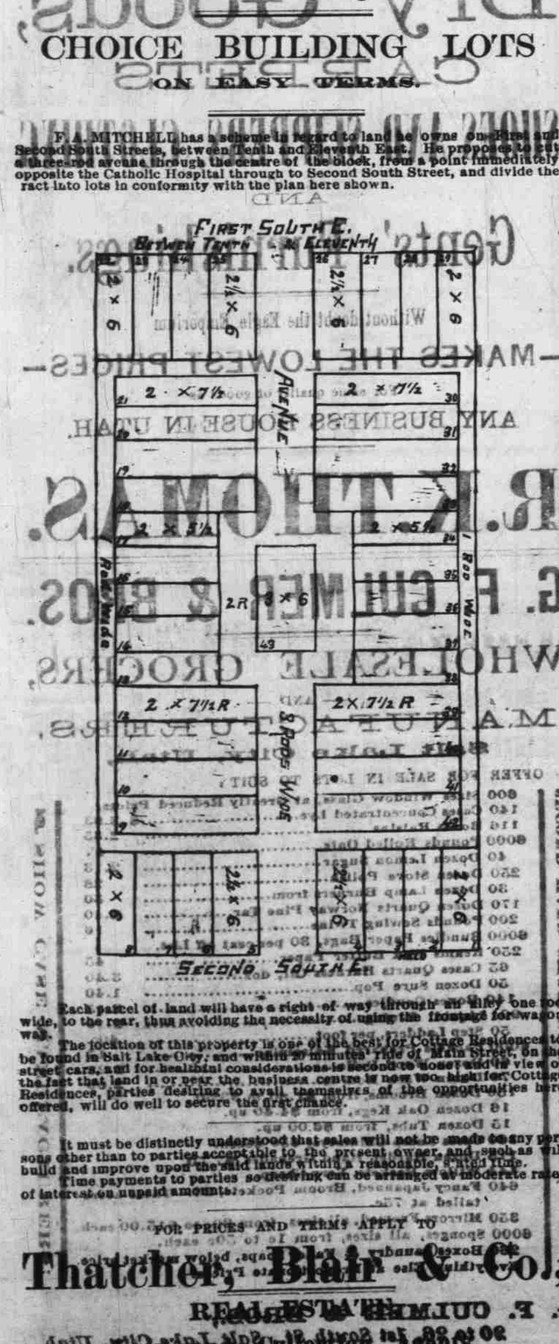
Homes for the Working Classes!

CHOICE BUILDING LOTS ON EASY TERMS.

F. A. MITCHELL has a scheme in regard to land he owns on First and Second South Streets, between Tenth and Eleventh East. He proposes to cut a three-rod avenue through the centre of the block, from a point immediately opposite the Catholic Hospital through to Second South Street, and divide the tract into lots in conformity with the plan here shown.



Each parcel of land will have a right of way through an alley one rod wide, to the rear, thus avoiding the necessity of using the frontage for wagon way.

The location of this property is one of the best for Cottage Residences to be found in Salt Lake City, and within 20 minutes' ride of Main Street, on the street cars, and for healthful considerations is second to none; and in view of the fact that land in or near the business portion is now too high for Cottage Residences, parties desiring to avail themselves of the opportunities here offered, will do well to secure the first chance.

It must be distinctly understood that sales will not be made to any persons other than to parties acceptable to the present owner, and such as will build and improve upon the said lands within a reasonable stated time.

Time payments to parties so desiring can be arranged at moderate rates of interest on unpaid amounts.

EXERCISE FOR GIRLS.

Marion Harland on the Physical Training of Young Women.

SOME CALISTHENICS IN WHICH WOMEN CAN INDULGE—EXERCISE FOUND IN HOUSE DUTIES—PEDESTRIANISM FOR GIRLS—OUR WOMEN DO NOT USE THEIR LIMBS WELL—SHOULD BUSINESS MEN GIVE UP THEIR SEATS IN CARS TO WOMEN?—SOME DANGEROUS FORMS OF EXERCISE—THE GREAT VALUE OF EQUESTRIANISM—PRACTICAL HINTS FOR YOUNG GIRLS.

It has been forcibly said that a woman must be regarded as woman, not as a nondescript animal, with greater or less capacity for assimilation to man."

It is not my purpose to enter into explanation of the physiological reasons why certain kinds of bodily exercise that do profit man should not be participated in by our sex. The limitations of a popular essay, however familiar to fore, exclude free plainness of speech. If Our Girl would read and comprehend why her tripartite nature needs more judicious management than her brother's simpler organism let her consult the law and the prophets as represented by the many valuable treatises written for her express benefit.

It may not be invidious to single out from among a score or more of these as pleasant and helpful reading, "Hints for Girls," by Frances Davis, M. D. I trust, furthermore, that no one will misconstrue the intended to a work into which I put a year of life and more earnest, loving thought for my sex than I can ever express in any other manner. I allude to "Eve's Daughters," the motto of which volume might well be, "Know thyself!" the simplest and most solemn lesson ever set for the race.

Custom is not so tyrannical to women as she is usually supposed to be. The division of daily labor, as tacitly decreed by the ordinary routine of the household, is wisely appointed. Man "goeth forth" unto his work, from morning even unto the evening. Wet feet, damp clothing, the straining, lifting, and standing at desk and in workshop, incidental or unavoidable in the discharge of business duties, are at the worst, but inconvenience and fatigue to him, who by their work positive injury to a woman. Thoughtful physiologists account what is classed as "light housework" among the most healthful occupations of girls.

Sweeping, when properly done, is an important branch of calisthenics. To this end, one should dress for the task as in the gymnasium, in plastic Jersey, basque or waist, and short skirts. Accoutred thus, and with her hair put away under a cap, Our Girl should open at least one window of the apartment cleared for action, and begin, with long, steady, slow strokes, to sweep the dampened dust toward the centre of the floor. The exercise brings into play all the muscles of the trunk, without unfair stress upon any one set, while the pacing to and fro, as the rubbish is collected by the besom into the middle of the chamber, ready for whisk and dust-pan, equalizes circulation in the lower part of the body. The broom should be long-handled, and care be taken not to stoop while plying it.

Bed-making, except in the initial stage of turning heavy mattresses, is healthful and not ungraceful work. So is dusting when a square of cheesecloth or other soft fabric is employed to remove the dust and carry it away. I make the proviso, because the act of whisking off the powdery particles with a feather-brush is scattering abroad, not gathering. They whirl into the air and settle again in a few minutes a fair proportion of them finding lodgment in skin-pores and lungs. Dusting cannot be too quietly and thoroughly done. The windows on the side of the room from which the wind does not blow should always, if possible, be open while it is going on. Women lose much of the specific advantage of housework by conducting it in stuffy, airless chambers. Dust, in such circumstances, is a synonym for disease. Should the flow of cold air be so eagerly crisp as to make the worker move briskly to keep warm, all the better. Many a conscientious holder of hygienic principles who leaves her pale mother to wear through with the bulk of the day's drudgery, or commits the cleansing of the home to irresponsible hirelings while she seeks health in a long "constitutional" abroad, would have gained her end as surely, if not as agreeably, had she borne her share in the homely toil.

But, the housework accomplished, Our Girl must walk—not saunter—in the free, boundless outer air every day.

"Give me an errand as a raison d'aller!" pleaded one upon whom the duty was urged. "A walk without an object is a bore! I must hope to find a pot of money at the end of my rainbow!" Poor child!

There is always an object, priceless beyond rubies, at the end of the walk. Vigor of body and clearness of thought, firm grace of figure, elasticity of limb, roses for the cheek and light for the eyes. The women who "never walk when they can ride" need not announce the fact in such a lachrymose tone. There is a drag on the feet, a stoop in the whole body, a "sag" of the moral muscles, that are the certain consequences of the evasion of that one of nature's laws which sets people upon their feet, and bids them use them before they can talk.

The best walker I ever saw was hopelessly plain of feature—by inheritance—yet the sojourners in the mountain hotel where she was passing the summer crowded to the windows to see her cross the lawn on her down the road. Her skirts were of a modest length, just clearing the instep; she wore stout boots that were well-fitted and trim; as she trod, she cast the whole weight of her body on the ball of the foot, rising very slightly on the toe. She held herself perfectly erect, yet not stiffly; chest expanded, shoulders down and back; her motion reminded one of the straight flight of a bird, the right power, sweep of a canoe—of all swift and graceful things—never recalling the lounge, or slide, or hitching hobble, or pigeon-like perk, that go for walking with the bevies of well-dressed women one meets every hour on street and road. Watch the tide tumbling and bubbling along the great thoroughfares of our cities on a fine afternoon if you would rightly or confirm the assertion that not one woman in a thousand uses her lower limbs well, or cares to learn how to employ them in any exercise except dancing. Where one "strikes out freely and fearlessly the slow hundred and ninety-and-nine shuffle, lunge, bob and waddle.

Men know it, if women do not. Ask [illegible] for any [illegible] pavement without feeling as if he were hobbled; how often he has to execute the "half-step" that recovers the rhythmic pace, royally disregarded by his fair companion.

Some years ago a petition was circulated among the clerks of large city shops, asking that the salesworkers in such place be allowed seats behind the counter for use in the pauses of active custom. The plea was humane and merciful. The leader in that it should be heeded.

"I always give up my seat to an old lady," said a young man who crosses a crowded ferry twice daily. Young [illegible] as well as a tired fellow who has been on his feet all day. When they come, on board street cars or ferry boats, I lose my newspaper."

He was no more civil to one class and no more cruel to the other than the rank and file of gentlemen who man "ladies' tables," and hold the seats of omnibus and tram. Let us hope (charitably) that all are alike ignorant of the truth that elderly ladies, unless especially infirm, are often more able to stand in a crowded tram way across the ferry, or to hang jollingly for a mile to a roof-strap, than are their daughters. I have seen rosy cheeks whiten, slender, gloved hands clench, convulsively in the agony of holding against the spiner and tilt. Nothing can be more cruel than the outcry against the unconscious barbarity of thin-flanked, broad-backed men who must have had mothers, wives, and daughters of their own at home.

Our Girl can more safely and comfortably fare two hundred yards—provided her stays are not tight—than stand fifteen minutes in one place. Dr. Davis reminds us in his book that the ancient Greeks "far surpassed all other nations in physical culture, and their mythology name Atalanta, a woman of great swiftness and endurance." Modern research has proved that the Greek athletes were not the only people who practiced calisthenics, but have added, without the [illegible] to alternate the weight of the lower trunk from one side to the other, hurtful—is not a fit exercise for Our Girl. When it is necessary to leap from stile or vehicle, she should be careful to alight on her toes, thus lessening somewhat the shock to the spinal column. Serious and incurable diseases have followed upon a spring from a fence or wagon that would have been less than nothing to a firmly-knit man. Swinging by the arms from a bar, climbing hand over hand, and lifting heavy weights, are also imprudent and dangerous forms of gymnastic exercise for women, however healthfully they may develop men's muscles. The same may be said of prolonged indulgence in amusements that are beneficial if enjoyed in moderation, such as tennis, rowing, and what may be termed modified baseball. I have known girls who were capital pitchers, better catchers, and tolerable batters, but the diversion, as usually practiced by "clubs" and "nines," is hardly to be recommended to the sisters of the "nine."

Riding combines the most desirable characteristics of all other forms of healthful exercise. The equestrian must learn to carry her shoulders back and keep a square seat in a saddle, the muscles of the whole body are excited to gentle play, and the recreation must needs be taken in the open air when once the preliminary lessons in the riding school are over. The expense of keeping a saddle-horse in town is reasonably insisted upon as an objection to the practicability of making the habit tolerably general, and those which are kept for hire are held at an exorbitant price. To obtain the great good, it is nevertheless worth while to make sacrifices of the less. Resistance to the temptation to lay out one's allowance in jewelry, laces, bric-a-brac, and numerous toilettes would put within Our Girl's reach this incomparable mode of perfecting her physical training, or equipping herself in mind, body and spirits, for the gravely responsible duties that outlie the heyday of youth.

MARION HARLAND.

"THE MARSEILLAISE."

SONG AND AIR THE INSPIRATION OF ROUGET DE L'ISLE.

On April 20th, 1792, the national assembly of France voted for war with the emperor of Austria. It was a solemn moment, for it was the opening of a struggle that was to last for thirty years; a struggle in which France, single handed, would have to contend against the armies of Europe. If reason had been alone consulted, there seemed no hope of success.

Strasburg, in the month of April, 1792, was in a condition typical of most of the great towns throughout France. Its streets, its squares, were filled with people of all ages, but chiefly with young men. The bells were tolling, and mothers and sisters were hurrying to the churches, for the dread boom of cannon was heard at intervals. But the new hope, the new faith, rendered the young full of joy, and fetes and banquets, singing, embracing and hand-shaking were the order of the day.

The mayor of Strasburg entered with all his heart into the popular feeling, and on the day after the vote for war he entertained some officers at his house. Among them came a young man from Franche Comte, named Rouget de l'Isle. Born at Lons le Saulnier, in the jura, the son of a barrister connected with the provincial parliament, well educated, and already known as a poet and musician, this young man of 23 represented the ardent and generous impulses that distinguished the youth around him. Mayor Dietrich's nieces and some other Alsatian ladies who were present added to the enthusiasm of the gathering. The wish was uttered that some poet might be inspired to express in a national song the intense feeling which at the moment made France a people. The host turned to Rouget de l'Isle and urged him to try to do this, and the company present joined in the appeal.

There is more than one account of the circumstances which attended this request, but a note is preserved in the Bibliotheque Nationale at Paris, written by M. Delabarre, a friend of Rouget de l'Isle's, which is said to give the facts as narrated on the poet's own authority:

"M. Dietrich appealed to him to compose both words and music of the song required. All concurred in the request, and about an hour before midnight he returned home, and, finding his violin on his bed he took it up, and, full of the idea of that which he was requested to do, he began playing upon the upper strings for a fugue for the air. Believing himself to have found it, he immediately composed the words. Trusting entirely to memory, and not committing anything to paper, he went to bed. The next morning, rising at six, he fortunately recollected both music and words. He took them himself to M. Dietrich, to whom he submitted it, and who was not a little astonished at its very prompt inspiration. He was in his garden, and, after a cursory perusal of the song he said: 'Let us go into the drawing room, that I may try your air on the piano.' He was struck with its beauty, aroused his wife, who was still in bed, and directed that each of the guests of the night before should be bidden to breakfast, as he had something of importance to communicate to them. All came, believing that he had already received news of blows struck in the war, from Gens. Luckner and Lafayette. He would not satisfy their curiosity on the point until they had breakfasted. Then he sang the hymn heartily, and it produced immediate admiration."

According to Michelet's version, some one had said that "Allons" should be the key note of the hymn; and now, as the poet entered the room, he came singing the strophe:

"Alions, enfants de la patrie!"

The friends listened with ever increasing emotion; it seemed, both words and music, as a flash of light from heaven; it expressed, in a way characteristic of a true inspiration, the feeling of every heart. France had not only realized her unity, but found the gift of speech.

The song, once sung, passed like wildfire from mouth to mouth, and in two months was all over France. The poet called it "Hymn of the Army of the Rhine," and he sent it the same day to Gen. Luckner, who was at the head of this portion of the French troops. It was immediately printed via Bale, and notwithstanding partisans and those who could not obtain a copy, made one for themselves. The orchestra at the theatres gave it, and the band of the national guard played it on the following Sunday.

Who composed the music? Undoubtedly, as we have said, music and verse were of one and the same inspiration. Germany has claimed the music as taken from a mass by Holtzman, but research has been unable to find the mass in question, or that such a composer ever lived. The point is settled in the fact that in the original impression, dedicated to Luckner, and published at Strasburg, in 1792, the music is there, and that contemporaries who knew Rouget de l'Isle, say that it was he himself who composed it. It would be difficult to find a national ode filled with a patriotic fervor more intense, but the music is undoubtedly superior to the words, and it remains to say the most inspiring the modern world possesses.

The Austrian emperor had made three demands; Submission to the first two would have reduced France to a fief of Germany. The third was still more odious, for it meant a return to the old order of things.

The answer came in the "Hymn of the Army of the Rhine."

In June, 1792, it was sung to the volunteers departing from Marseilles, and in each was revived a copy. Three days after the insurrection of the 10th, the famous "six hundred, who knew how to die," entered Paris, singing what had now become the hymn of the revolution. Henceforth it was called the "Hymn of the Marseillaise," and then simply the "Marseillaise." It did at once terrible and effective work; for to its strains the Tuileries were taken and the French monarchy overthrown. Valmy and Jemappes followed, and the invasion collapsed. What the ode did in battle may be seen by a demand of one of the republican generals: "Send me 1600 men and a copy of the 'Marseillaise.'"—Leisure Hour.

DIDO VERSUS A NEW SENSATION.—I have a little friend who, at a very tender age, is fond of romping. Notwithstanding that she is getting tired and sleepy, she will jump or dance, as it is sometimes called. One evening I said:

"Grace, I see you are jumping; it is time for bed."

She spoke up quickly and said:

"Mamma, I was not jumping; that was only another kind of sneeze."—Boston Globe.

Getting Things Mixed.

A newly-elected justice of the peace, who had been used to drawing up deeds and wills and little else, was called up to marry a couple in haste. Removing his hat he remarked: "Hats off in the presence of the court." All being uncovered he proceeded: "Hold up your right hand. You, John Mankins, do yer solemnly swear, to the best of your knowledge an' belief, that yer this woman to have an' to hold for yerself, yer heirs, executers, administrators and assigns, for yer an' their use an' behoof forever?"

"I do," answered the groom promptly.

"You, Alice Evans, take this yer man for yer husband, ter have and ter hold forever; an' you do solemnly swear that yer lawfully seized in fee simple an' free from all encumbrance, an' have good right to sell, bargain and convey to said grantee, yerself, yer heirs, administrators and assigns?"

"I—I do," said the bride doubtfully.

"Well, that 'er's wuth a dollar 'n fifty cents."

"Are we married?" asked the bride.

"Yes. Know all men by these presents that I, being in good health and of sound mind and disposition, in consideration of a dollar 'n fifty cents, to me in hand well an' truly paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do an' by the presents have declared you man an' wife durin' good behavior an' until otherwise ordered by the court."
