WORK IN A GREAT CITY.

In proportion to her population, Salt Lake spends more for municipal purposes than does New York City, owing to conditions connected with the building up of a new city which spreads over a considerable area. But with the figures of expense per capita this comparison ends; when it comes to the aggregate disbursements in even one important department, in the great metropolis these are simply stupendous. They also indicate the vast amount of care that burdens competent administrative ability in the largest city on the continent.

An illustration may be found in the report of the New York department of public works, of which Commissioner Michael T. Daly is the head. The report for 1894 shows that during that year the expenditures in this one department were $7,114,611, of which over three millions went to meet previously incurred liabilities. The remaining amount, nearly four millions, was used in current expenses, [illegible] going to street improvement and $[illegible] for repaving. During the year twenty miles of new pavement were laid, making a total of [illegible] miles in the city, of which [illegible] miles is stone, 62.34 asphalt, and [illegible] macadam. The pavement was torn up 17,475 times for house connections for water, gas and sewer pipes; the gas companies tore up and relaid [illegible] miles of streets, the electric subway workers [illegible] [illegible]

A PRESIDENTIAL DISCOVERY.

[illegible]

[illegible] him out of the list of candidates for the higher office; while if he should succeed he would at once bound into almost certain national prominence as a highly available man for the Democrats to place at the head of their columns. Of course, in such a case there would be a radical departure from the policy of selecting candidates from doubtful states in order to make sure of the electoral votes of those states; but there are Democrats sanguine enough to believe that notwithstanding Pennsylvania's recent Republican majority of two hundred thousand, the state might still be classed as "doubtful" for the Republicans if Pattison headed the Democratic ticket.

AN ICELANDIC PAPER.

The NEWS is in receipt of a copy of the Isafold, one of the leading journals of Iceland and published at Reykjavik. It was sent to this office by Mr. John Thompson, of Bannock, Mont., whose interesting articles occasionally have appeared in our columns. Since Iceland, in its history, literature and language, offers much of value to the students of the earliest history of northern Europe and even claims through its brave sailors to have paved the way for the discovery of the American continent, this representative of its modern journalism has been scanned with great interest.
