PROVO.

PROVO, UTAH, SEPT. 16, 1896.

GREAT SILVER MEETING.

Senator Cannon and Mr. Varian Address a Large and Enthusiastic Audience.

The silver meeting held last evening in the Opera house was a magnificent ovation to Senator Frank J. Cannon and Hon. C. S. Varian and an enthusiastic demonstration of approval of the positions these candidates and their associates have taken on the financial question. They arrived on the 6:20 p. m. train from Salt Lake and were met by prominent citizens at the depot in carriages and taken to the Bristol Hotel.

Bonfires were burning in the streets and in front of the Opera house. Gillman's band discoursed patriotic airs. The house was filled with an enthusiastic audience awaiting the arrival of Utah's champions. Senator Cannon, who is expected to leave for Washington on Monday, and Mr. Varian, continue to bearing what they have to say in support of the independent silver movement. Their appearance was the signal for great enthusiastic applause. On the stage, which was decorated with flags and streamers, were seated representatives of all political parties. Two large banners bearing the following mottoes were strung across the stage: "Welcome to the champions of silver, W. S. and D '96 who we stand in '95," "A vote for Wm. J. Bryan means free silver and prosperity for Utah."

Mayor Holbrook briefly addressed the meeting, stating that in discussing principles of vital interest to the country there was no necessity nor desire to unduly excite any one nor to create strife, the object was to advocate and defend those principles that would bring prosperity to the people. Those principles have passed from the realm of theory and would unite to redress any wrongs attempted to be imposed upon them. He introduced the first speaker, Senator Cannon, who was very received with vociferous applause.

Mr. Cannon commenced by saying that it was in this building there he received his first authoritative commission from the Republican party to speak for it in the national convention in 1892; in this city last night he received notice of his nomination for Congress, which had been confirmed by the voice of the people of Utah, and he was happy to come back and say that, so far as he knew, no had not once departed from the platform upon which the people had nominated him to sit in Congress. He was now seeking something greater than party name and the possession of office; that was what led the people across the Wasatch and Oquirrh mountains and from the Utah of today, and he doubted not but people of Utah today would discharge their duty with unwavering devotion to the welfare of the State. He had said during the campaign last fall that if the Republican party would not so justice to the people, and if the Democratic party would not do justice to the people, a new party could arise that would sweep the country and do the people's will. In saying that he gave no hasty pledge that he would support the principles of justice, no matter what party promulgated them.

Senator Cannon read the following extract from the Congressional Record, published February 3rd, 1887, under the head of "silver legislation": "Will the Senate consider it not a mere moment's time perhaps of silver legislation of the United States of the white metal. It is a bill that would give this country prosperity. It is because now we would not do a step to demonetize the precious have been making an Undesirable's treasury. They can control the money of our country when as a gold basis, and if once silver were made as sacred as gold, the volume of currency or ultimate redemption would be in proportion to their mental power. Are we afraid for free the free coinage of substance will not pass the House and were it to pass the president would veto it. But the political power of silver has been shown, as on the economical, and the next great election may change the composition of the lower house. What silver does need most is to watch in the place contest. No candidate ought to be selected who was not in his publicity known that he will not veto a free coinage bill should it be passed." (The Senate substitute bill receive to one a bill for the free, unrestricted and independent coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.)

He believed this was true then and believed so and the same right now as there to declare our position to the principles that made Utah Republican. He could not have been a party man that had to have come back to Congress and to the Senate of the Republican party would do justice by them, but unfortunately the parties had changed their attitude to the great question of bimetallism, the supreme issue of the age, the question upon the solution of which depended not only our industries but the very existence of the government.

Senator Cannon urging that the wealth of the nation had quadrupled in 30 years, but under a fiat money system it has not increased all the wealth and the nation was plunged into debt greater than the assessed valuation of all the property in the nation, and it is now time to change a money system under which those who trade should also prosper, but unless there is sufficient money to create high prices for labor and the labor of the land the slavery of debt. The speaker explained at length that if money did not increase correspondingly with other property, the other property would necessarily decrease in value. All the gold in the United States is already up under the control of foreign powers and not one dollar can remain without the consent of the foreign bankers. Forever and yet the world had kept a ratio of its production of gold and silver, and the ratio of the two metals so produced by the Creator was about 16 to 1 all late tinkering to the contrary by law notwithstanding. The United States could not expect England to agree to the change of this ratio because it was not in her interest to do so as she produced about ninety millions of gold annually and only twelve millions of silver, and the present ratio of silver to gold favored the prime of commodities that England was in duty.

After further consideration of the money and disadvantages of the single gold standard Senator Cannon showed that if the Republican party is placed in power and does up to its goldism, which he believed is would, the current look for free coinage from that party, and the policy pursued by President Cleveland in selling bonds to keep up the supply of gold would be continued by Mr. McKinley and he would not condemn to President Cleveland that which he would not condemn in President McKinley. Senator Cannon called attention to some of the Democratic methods used in the McKinley campaign, such as providing "sound money and protection" banner for the eastern states and "protection and bimetalism" banners for the western states, and to an interview in which Senator Chandler of New Hampshire had charged that money for the purpose of improperly influencing the nomination of Arthur McKinley was used. This interview had been read on the floor of the Senate and Senator Chandler had not denied it. The speaker closed in an eloquent peroration urging the people to cast their votes for Bryan and not distract a party that had been a home. (The speaker of Bryan, whenever mentioned, called forth hearty applause.)

Mr. Varian, who was greeted with a long and enthusiastic ovation, referred further the evils of a contracted currency and the necessity for its expanding with the growth and the needs of the people. He said that it was that without sufficient money to put industries in operation without fear of bankruptcy protection would not prove beneficial, and pointed to the prosperous condition of Mexico on a silver basis. The Republicans who were still halting in the free silver tenet, he said, had put forth a number of bolted tickets, anarchists, etc., etc., because they would not desert a principle which they had clung to for many years, and that by people who had not been acquainted with Republicanism for over five years. In the Chicago convention the principle of bimetalism was adopted against all the power of the old party leaders, they said here is a people's party and a people's tally, we can trust and follow that faith, and to doing so they are following a great tribune of the people and standing by their party platform. Mr. Varian spoke of the injustice and hypocrisy of the Eastern Republicans in not allowing our convention to meet in Mount Pleasant to vote for McKinley electors, which they said here, and instead of sending to Ogden to vote for a silver man as representative to Congress. He advised the Republicans who were in attendance that there was nothing to do with these conventions but to send delegates to the Independent Republican convention to meet in Salt Lake City and help put in nomination a silver Republican to Congress, and continue labors if the convention so decided.

Mayor Holbrook then briefly regard to the free silver resolution adopted by the Trans-Mississippi congress in St. Louis in 1894, which was so far as he knew, the last time delegates which was then approved by the people of Utah, and he did not think the people had changed in their views since that time.
