THE WEATHER.

Prof. Harrington, who has been permitted to resign as head of the U. S. Weather bureau, takes occasion also to say some pretty severe things about his chief, Secretary Morton. In effect he maintains that his removal was because he refused to allow his office to be used by spoilsmen and insisted on the retention of competent and faithful employes whose places were wanted for friends of Secretary Morton. We are bound to say that the secretary's past record does not warrant the acceptance of the complaint against him—so far as known in the West he has been a civil service reformer of the most practical sort and has instituted many valuable and economical departures in the agricultural bureau and its political branches.

But the thought suggested by the resignation is, not that Secretary Morton needs defense at the hands of this paper, but that if the authorities at Washington want the very best article of weather that the market affords, they cannot do better than secure for the Harrington vacancy the services of the clerk who has been dispensing weather to this community for the past three or four months. He is an adept and a master in the business, and even the bathing resorts join in the opinion that he is deserving of promotion to a higher-priced position and ought to be removed to it without delay, taking his recipe with him.

MR. WALLER'S CASE.

The new famous case of ex-Consul Waller of Madagascar is likely to cause some diplomatic trouble between the United States and France, and call for firm and skilful manipulation on the part of the state department, if he desire is to terminate it in a manner fully consistent with the honor and dignity of our government. Ever since the report was brought to this country of the arrest and heavy sentence of Mr. Waller by French authorities, an explanation has been demanded, but so far France has given no definite sign of a willingness to comply with the request, and were still, the prisoner has been subjected to treatment that no American citizen should suffer in a foreign, friendly country.

Mr. Waller, during his service as American consul at Tamatave, sympathized with the natives whom he considered oppressed by the French. Possibly on that account he, in 1894, succeeded in obtaining from the Hova government valuable concessions of land in Madagascar. The French residents, of course, protested against this. France claimed protectorate over the island, and because the native government is used to recognize that claim, an expedition was sent to subdue the Hovas. An article in a Madagascar paper stating that the time had come for the United States to back up American enterprise in the island further exasperated the French. Mr. Waller was seized. It was claimed that he had given information to the native prejudicial to the French expedition, and he was merely tried before a court martial and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment, and his request for an appeal was refused.

In Washington the explanation was offered that the French had declared on an attack on a Hova town. Preparations were made with the utmost secrecy, but the Hovas obtained information of the movement and met the French fully armed and prepared for resistance. Waller, it was claimed, gave the information. It is in this story the needs to be fully investigated. On the face of it it appears somewhat strange. If the French preparations were strictly secret, how did Waller, as ready known to be a friend of the natives, obtain the information allowed to have? And if the secrecy was not better guarded, might not other friends of the Hovas, or native spies, have become aware of the hostile intention without the aid of Waller? At any rate, the fact itself that an American citizen was subjected to it as a liberty and denied the privilege of a full investigation appears in the light of a blunder on the part of some French subordinate officials, that the government ought to be willing to repudiate and correct. It is not claimed that Mr. Waller, if he really transgressed any recognized law, should not take the consequences; but no government should be allowed to subject citizens of another government to arbitrary measures. The honor of the country and the safety of its citizens in foreign lands are involved in the case.

ONE OF THEM.

An eastern newspaper contains a paragraph to the effect that "Damian Hauser, who died at Denver on June 24th at the age of 82, was a lieutenant in the Illinois militia at the time the Mormons were driven out of that state in 1845, and took part in the attack on the town near Nauvoo when Joseph Smith, the first Prophet of Mormonism, was shot dead by a body of Illinois militia. Mr. Hauser was a warm personal friend of Stephen A. Douglas, who was a frequent guest at his home in Quincy, Ill. He was a native of Constance, Germany."

There seems to be a popular impression that a man named Hauser was connected with the mob that slew the Prophet and Patriarch in June, 1844, but other statements in the foregoing quotation are exceedingly inaccurate. The Mormons were not driven out of Illinois in 1845; the place where Joseph and Hyrum Smith and their companions were confined, under the pledge of the protection of the state, was not a town, but a jail at Carthage; and it was not a body of Illinois militia as such, but a mob (containing no doubt disguised members of the militia) that did the cruel and atrocious deed. If Mr. Hauser was one of them, history is the richer from his having confessed it; but it is no act that any man may have been ready to wish to keep quiet about; and it is hard to see how anyone could feel to boast over it or have it prominently mentioned in his epitaph.

A BORE IN THE RELIGIOUS CAMP.

It has come, as it was bound to do in time. The woman suffrage movement, bitherto confined to political issues, has made its appearance in the ecclesiastical domain in a manner that may lead to a complete revolution in sectarian church government, or dissolution of strong denominations.

Dr. Alice B. Campbell, the first lady admitted to practice medicine in Brooklyn, a member of a Methodist church for twenty-seven years, has now withdrawn her name from the church "because unwilling to remain longer in an organization that sanctions taxation without representation." Suppose the women generally in the various denominations would follow the example of the distinguished lady mentioned! It is probable that the leaders of Methodism and most other bodies would sooner submit to a revision of both Discipline and other ecclesiastical regulations and some doctrine, too, than see their churches cut in two by the withdrawal of the women. That would be sure death to most denominations.

But the action of Dr. Campbell suggests that the lady looks upon the laws of the church with which she has been identified as nothing but man-made. Had they, in her estimation, divine authority, she could presumably not protest by withdrawing from their jurisdiction. If, then, her church rests on no other foundation than one that can be changed to suit the varying sentiments of the time, what need is there of such an organization at all? It will appear clear to many, on considering the case in a new light, that man-made laws for the government of the church cannot obtain divine authority by the addition of the women to the representative assemblies. If a religious body has no regulations given by God and equally binding on both men and women, the whole is a farce, and the sooner both men and women withdraw from the stage where it is acted, the better. It is not to see the strong language to say that Dr. Campbell has turned a bomb in the religious camp, the explosion of which is likely to reach so consequences more far-reaching than can at present be fully appreciated. One will from the start obtain many followers.

Incidentally the observation may be made that most of the great questions that now agitate the world are ingrafted in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, although the answer is disguised in the institutions and practices with which the Church members are familiar. There is therefore not the slightest cause for that excitement which leads people to embrace one way or another. The world is equally floundering in a condition in which nothing but the Gospel can ultimately remedy.

MRS. O'LEARY'S LEGALIZED COW.

The death last Wednesday of Mrs. O'Leary, whose cow is supposed to have kicked over the lamp which started the fire which laid Chicago in ashes, revives interest in that memorable event, and we and that story, with the letter we have only to do, present, and read and note the opportunity in current events that it is a north-east and south, a lakeshore cut of whole cloth. Where it first started are its results, within a few years after the great fire broke out, Mrs. O'Leary branded it as untrue, and she related the charge till and so until her death. The cow, poor thing, has long since passed the way of all flesh, but she lived long enough to see a mountain of evidence piled up to her exoneration of the unruly lamp stubbed it. Destiny has gone on blindly, however, and notwithstanding all entertainment, it cannot do so smiling. Now that Mrs. O'Leary is dead, as it it was every word true. It all illustrates how prone the world is to hang on to a good lie.

Russia seems to be a great deal more anxious to lend money to China than the latter country is to accept the favor. The czar's government is getting hard hitted and demands a definite reply from Pekin. When a money lender as poor as Russia is in comfortable capital to be in a hurry to invest a large sum, there must be some good reason for it, and in this case the reason is probably that with millions of dollars invested in China, Russia would have for a long time to come a sufficient cause for interference in the affairs of eastern Asia, and she would be considered justified in guarding her "interests," even were it necessary in so doing to occupy a Chinese province or two. To Russia the war loan means more than an innocent financial transaction.

The editor of the News has received the following request from a city correspondent:

"Won't you kindly ascertain and advise me what relation to me is a son of my first cousin?

"We do not know where to ascertain such relationship. One well known genealogist in this city calls the son of his first cousin, his "first cousin once removed," the relationship being intermediate between first and second cousins, the latter term applying to the respective children of first cousins. Of course the relationship our correspondent asks about is technically known as the "fifth degree of consanguinity."

More than a hundred years ago, in 1785, a South Carolina parish (then newly formed west through the formality of electing a member to the general assembly. The interesting part of the proceeding is that the old poll list, containing the electors, is illuminated by the names of six women. These ladies were among the most distinguished residents of the neighborhood in their day, and their names are perpetuated today in hundreds of descendants in the adjacent counties. The more the matter comes to be studied, the more plain will it appear that woman suffrage has had very ancient and creditable precedent.

The Fourth National Irrigation congress will meet in Albuquerque, New Mexico, on the 16th of September next. In this democratic country the arrival of a little princess is not, as in Europe, hailed by the boom of cannon, the hoisting of flags and special prayers in the churches. Nevertheless the joy in the home of President Cleveland at this time is heartily shared by millions of his fellow citizens, and the congratulations are sincere. Long life and happiness to the baby sister of Ruth and Esther!

AN OPINION GIVEN.

Recently Mr. J. B. Thomas, of North Dakota, visited the Shenandoah Valley, Virginia, and after carefully examining the country located in Winchester, he writes to Mr. V. Richards, Land and Immigration Agent, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Baltimore, Maryland, as follows: "I have been in nearly every state and territory of the United States, and am frank in my opinion that the valley surpasses all other sections in the Union. The lands are low in price, and produce profitable crops. I thank you for directing me here, and advise those seeking pleasant and profitable homes to locate in this country."
