PROF. MILLS AND THE FARMERS.

Prof. A. A. Mills, president of the Utah State Agricultural society, has made a speech and has written a letter. We will not give either very extended notice; yet we feel in duty bound to pay sufficient attention to them to let the public know just what Professor Mills is doing, and they can form their own estimate of his purposes in the agitation he is seeking to arouse. The speech was delivered Thursday before the society meeting in the Joint city and county building, and we quote from it as it appears verbatim in a morning contemporary. The letter was written to the News by Mr. Mills, in response to a pointed friendly criticism of his course, which he accepts in anything but a friendly spirit. In his address yesterday Prof. Mills stated:

There is no doubt but laws are made and manipulated against the interest of the farmer. This is not to be wondered at, as to the law-making bodies of the land we find but few farmers, and as a rule, he is the only class not extensively represented, so he falls an easy prey to all other classes.

Mr. Mills says "the farmers of Utah" are groaning under a heavy burden, and it is to them he addresses his remarks. Let us see how his statement about law-making bodies fits Utah, the place we are interested in, as he endeavors to make it so. A careful examination into the classification of all the legislatures Utah ever has had shows the vast majority of the members to have been farmers. No other industry has received anything like such representation. The farmer's vote has dominated the legislature throughout. We make no objection to this large percentage of legislators from the farming class. It suits us perfectly. We merely cite it to warn the public of Prof. Mills's unfortunate absence of veracity in his deliberate statements. He has given several other evidences of it in the quotation made, but we will pass them by. Again he says:

As all know, there has been but one Territorial fair in the past three years, and so far as agriculture is concerned, it was simply a side-show of the last fair. Now Utah has more money invested in and derives more revenue from agriculture than from any other industry. Why, then, should agriculture be sidetracked at our fair?

This assault on the Deseret Agricultural and Manufacturing society ought to be very entertaining reading for Utah farmers who recall how much that society has done for the agricultural interests of Utah during its existence. And at the very fair referred to the premiums for farm development and agricultural interests generally were specially increased, to the detriment of some other departments, that the tiller of the soil might make his exhibit more than a "side-show." Prof. Mills's alleged "sidetracking" of agriculture by the fair directors is another sample of economizing the truth.

Then he attacks the recommendation of the society for a State board of agriculture to take charge of fairs, and says:

The great drawback to such boards, as a rule, is that they become places that can be used to get rid of some or too wearing politicians. And in all agricultural or industrial affairs the politician becomes the most obnoxious beast of prey. To obviate this I believe it would be cost no more this board than districts, for it would then be closer to the people than it would be were it appointed.

The public spirited men of Utah who have served in the management of fairs without compensation or hope of reward other than the knowledge of doing good to the whole people, and at financial loss to themselves, surely will appreciate this reference to "wearing politicians" and "obnoxious beast of prey." But this is only a subdued specimen of the fair and kindly spirit which characterizes the address. Then right on this, Prof. Mills wants the board to be thrown into the pool of politics as aforesaid. We trust he is not floating to be returned as a "wearing politician" or an "obnoxious beast of prey." Further, he wants each member of the fair board to represent the agricultural interest. We notice that the farmers of Utah are too just and honest to desire the extension of the stockgrower, the manufacturer, the miner, or any other interest of importance.

Prof. Mills also spoke upon irrigation and in this connection we will refer to his letter. Our position is that the rule which was prevailed in Utah as to title to the right to use water, should predominate in the State. Upon the irrigation discussion Mr. Mills writes:

I defy the News to show where I have attacked any man or any man's character in this discussion.

There have been numerous plans and counsels, one being the foundation in the speech from which we have quoted. But we will refer to an incident which the professor may have forgotten, though it occurred since the News suggested that it was not proper to unjustly assail men who had proved themselves true to the people here to a vastly greater extent than he has had opportunities of doing. Over his own signature, Mr. Mills, in the Logan Journal of Dec. 18, attack what he calls "the great irrigation" who compose the Irrigation association. He goes on to describe some of them as follows:

One is a member of the board of directors and one is a shareholder in one and the same great corporation of Utah; one is the president of another great irrigation corporation.

And so on with others. Mr. Mills has the response to his defiance from his own pen; and it reveals that there is something in the domain of ethics that he might study with profit. It will not do to beg the question by saying, as he does: "As far as I remember, there has been no man's name mentioned except my own." An assault on Governor Wells would be no less a direct attack because he might be described as the Governor-elect of Utah instead of mentioning him by name. Prof. Mills's subterfuge in this respect is cowardice which, as a young man who intends to make Utah his permanent home, he ought to cast aside along with the other unenviable attributes displayed in his speech yesterday and on other occasions. We hope this plain language will aid him to repentance; for there is none for good in his character if he does not smother it with bitterness.

One more word to the professor and to Utah farmers in general. What good is to be expected from the declaration that the farmers are a "prey to all other classes?" etc. Are the farmers making friends of those who are thus assailed? Does it do any good to sell one's neighbors bad names and then alienate them? Surely there is nothing to be gained for agriculturists by antagonizing everybody else. If the farmers want legislation in their behalf, and they should receive fair and generous treatment in this regard, the end is not likely to be gained by sarcasm and insolent speeches as readily as by joining to perfect harmony with others for the good of the whole. No benefits will accrue from raising a quarrel which is as needless as it is unpleasant, and it ought to be abandoned at once in the farmer's own interest.

CONSTANTINOPLE'S TREASURES.

In the memoirs of the French author Marc, a conversation which he had with an English diplomat about Constantinople over sixty years ago is recorded, and it is not without interest at this time, as showing that the conception about the Turkish capital may not always have been without an element of greed, considering the immense treasures supposed to be literally buried in the ancient city by the Bosphorus.

Marc expressed surprise that England should be so hungry for so poor a town as Turkey, whereat the English diplomat smiled and said, it is, of course, neither the wealth nor the poverty of the country that is any consideration to England, but since you have brought this question up, do not forget the immense hidden treasures in the Turkish capital. Every time a sultan dies, his remains are laid at rest among all his treasures in a "death chamber." Think of the immense wealth which a man like Mohammed II, who conquered Constantinople in 1453, must have in his grave! Think further of the whole series of sultans—the fabulously wealthy Selim I, who died in 1519, Soliman II, Achmet I and the mighty Soliman III. There is a whole series of these grave chambers, all sealed up with masonry and undisturbed, because something in the Mohammedan religion every grave is considered sacred.

This fact is well known, but there may still be room for doubt as to whether these resting-places of the dead have not, in centres of time, been divested of their treasures. Mind, all the sultans have been hard up and not scrupulously religious, and they may have considered necessity a higher law than the Koran, so it is possible that a conqueror of Constantinople might be disappointed in his expectations to find gold and precious stones.

OF DIFFERENT DATE.

Charles Brewsaiter, of Payson, sends the following:

To the Editor:

In the editorial columns of the Semi-Weekly News of Dec. 31, 1895, it is stated the story of whites being killed by Indians while seeking to rescue a Mormon emigrant's cow, is an event which exists only in imagination. Permit me to state a few facts.

In the year 1856 a large body of Mormon and Cheyenne Indians, numbering over 1,000 braves, were encamped on the south side of North Platte, about ten miles east of Fort Laramie. A Mormon emigrant train, consisting chiefly of handcarts, passed by them. The Indians wanted beef and killed a cow belonging to a member of the company. When the company reached Laramie they complained to the commander of the fort of the outrage. He promptly sent a small company of soldiers to inquire into the matter. The Indians measured the soldiers. To my recollection two privates or troopers were killed.

I was in the plains that year, traveling in Robert L. Campbell's company, and was on the ground a few days after the occurrence. I think all this happened in August of the year mentioned. The end of this episode culminated in the killing of Indian squaws by General Harney, in Ash Hollow, a year or two afterwards.

If our correspondent will read again the editorial note referred to he will see that the remark as to the imaginative character of the event related only to the Mormon emigrants en route over the Plains from Nauvoo, in 1847. It was on that date and company that the story quoted depended. Perhaps we would have made the matter clearer by saying that seven years later one of the incidents referred to in the story occurred, and had been made to do service for a prior occasion. The event of 1856, narrated by our correspondent, resulted in the death of 23 men—the doctor, and interpreter, and 19 privates. The officer was safe, but the responsibility for the killing was chiefly on the interpreter, who is said to have been under the influence of liquor. In detailing the story of the fight, the Indians said the interpreter was the last one to be killed. He pleaded for his life, reminding the savage warriors of favors he had shown them. The female reply was that as his indiscretion had caused the death of thirty of his own people, it was only fair to them that he should die too. The soldiers made a brave fight as long as able, the Indians losing among their killed a chief and his squaw.

UTAH LIVE STOCK NOTES.

The Chicago Live Stock Report for December 27 contains an article headed "Stock notes from Utah," written by Mr. A. E. De Riquier, of this city, which gives to the readers of the Live Stock Report some interesting items concerning Utah. Mention is made of the Lehi sugar factory, and the success attending sugar beet culture in this section, special attention being given to the company recently organized for feeding cattle at the sugar works. Mr. De Riquier states that the cattle there have been doing remarkably well, and will be ready for the market soon. Upon another branch, the article suggests that the feeding of horseflesh to hogs, as is being done in some parts of the West, notably in Nevada, may not produce healthy meat; and that "too much strong flesh might bring about an cholera or kindred diseases." This horseflesh proceeding does not obtain in Utah, so far as known.

Mr. De Riquier also gives attention to the efforts being made here to improve stock by breeding, stating that the tendency to do this is especially marked in sheep raising. The sheep of Utah are quite famous, says the article, and as a rule outsell those shipped from her sister states. The reason of this is because of the pains that the Mormons took in breeding up their flocks. Then again, it is stated, Utah is very much of an agricultural country, where there is a large extent of alfalfa and grain field pastures, and it is the practice of many sheepgrowers to utilize these fields in the fall of the year for the benefit of their flocks. Mr. DeRiquier thinks the future of Utah for stockgrowing is very bright, as it has a very large area of land possible of a high state of cultivation, and the tendency is to settle up the State in small farms. He says everyone familiar with the stock industry knows that it is the aggregation of small holders of live stock that creates the constant supply at the markets, and predicts that before many years we will witness a condition in Utah similar to Illinois, Iowa or Missouri, so far as the source of supply for the stock market is concerned.
