"YES, DARLING."

"I think you are very unreasonable," said Helen Morton tearfully.

"And I think you are very selfish," said Dick Morton angrily.

"Well, I am going to that masquerade party, and you may just as well make up your mind to it right now."

"I may just as well make up my mind, then, that you are going to do just exactly as you please, regardless of my wishes or my judgment," said Dick.

"When your judgment is as much at fault as it appears to be in this instance, you may make up your mind that I shall exercise my own judgment."

"Your what?" inquired Dick sarcastically, and Helen was so angry at this last shot that she floundered herself out of the room.

They had been married just six months. Helen was 18 and Dick was 23. They had always agreed perfectly about their mutual affairs till the question of the mask ball came up.

Dick did not like the young fellow who had sent them the invitation. Paul Elliott had been a little too attentive to Helen of late to suit Dick, who was a little jealous, as most husbands of young, pretty women are.

Helen was fond of attention. Not she was perfectly devoted to her husband, although she did love to tease him at times.

So she pretended to flirt with Paul Elliott, to Dick's intense annoyance and chagrin.

He lighted a cigar and started off down town without seeing Helen. It was the first time he had ever left the house without kissing her goodby, and she watched him from an upper window with a lump in her throat and an angry pucker between her pretty brows.

"All right, Mr. Dick," she said defiantly, brushing a tear away at the same time. "You can be sprightly and so can I. I'll go to that mask ball if I have to get a dispensation to do it."

And the silly girl immediately began her arrangements for her costume and mask. She telephoned to her friends, the Browns, who also knew, were going, and asked them to take her with them.

Helen decided to wear an old fashioned gown made in the style of the frocks of colonial days. It was of a rich yellow brocade, and as the modiste said to her, would suit her brunette beauty wonderfully well. Then she bought a yellow ostrich feather fan and satiny satin slippers and silk stockings of the same hue. Long, yellow suede gloves completed her purchases, and she went home to luncheon tired and unhappy, but with renewed determination.

The next night at 9 o'clock Helen stood in her room, gazing in the long glass mirror at herself. Her powdered hair was very becoming, and she turned instinctively to where Dick always stood when they were dressing to go out to seek his admiration. But Dick was not there, and with a smothered sob she gathered up her fan, gloves, bouquet and opera cloak and went slowly down stairs.

It was a brilliant party, but Helen enjoyed it not at all. She could not forget Dick, try as she would, and she felt all the time as if she must go off somewhere and have a "good cry."

Once two tears did run down behind her little black mask, but she quickly wiped them away and danced and laughed and chatted on. Presently she saw a tall man coming toward her.

"I wonder if that is Paul Elliott," she said to herself. He was masked, of course, but wore simply a domino over his evening suit.

"May I have the pleasure of this dance?" he asked.

Helen's heart stood still a moment and then went galloping away with her. It was Dick's voice.

"Certainly," she said in a quiver tone.

They waltzed away together, she thinking: "Surely he will know my step. No one else ever danced so well with him; he always tells me so."

But the tall man said "Sing except some commonplaces about music and the costumes.

When they stopped, he drew her into the conservatory, and, having found a quiet nook behind some big palms, he sank down beside her and began the most finished flirtation the heart of a coquette could desire.

Helen was dumfounded. Could this be her Dick—her loyal, devoted husband? A spasm of jealousy convulsed her heart. This, then, was the way he acted in her absence.

She replied wittily to his pretty speeches and held up her end of the little pastime very well. But just as soon as she could she said, in response to a tender remark of his:

"But, my dear sir, you know you don't mean that. It's very pretty and it amuses me, but I don't believe it. Why are you so shallow in your sentiments? If you had ever really cared for any one, you could not play at love in this fashion."

"The only woman I ever cared for was just like all the rest of your fair sex, maiden," said the domino sarcastically.

"She discarded the real love of a lifetime, the affection of a man who would have died for her, for the meaningless attentions of a fop. It flattered her vanity, and you know that after all that is what really counts with a woman."

He eyed her keenly, but could not see the mouth beneath the short, black mask, for she had turned her head away, and the white hand that lay trembling on her knee was the only sign of her agitation.

"Let us go back to the dance," he said quietly, "unless you would like me to get you an ice."

The lady in yellow sound unable to speak, but she made a gesture of assent and he started away to get an ice for her.

Eleven snatched off her mask as soon as he disappeared and gave way to her feelings completely. She sobbed as if her heart would break, and when the tall domino came back she sprang up and cried sharply:

"Oh, Dick, I'm not such a wicked wretch at all. I love you dearly, and I hate that man and everybody else but you."—Exchange.

A man who has made money out of agriculture says, "I believe that hog raising, taken year in and year out, is the most profitable business a farmer can engage in."

The offener money can be turned over in business the better. In raising hogs it is turned over once a year. In breeding horses and horses several years are required.

Give hogs access to plenty of ashes, salt, charcoal and clean water. At the same time see that they get plenty of middlings, bran, etc., with their corn, and they will not be apt to get cholera.

A good rubbing with salt water is the best cure for galls on horses' shoulders. A veteran horseman says to tie a cloth around the end of a cornob and dip the cob into an old fruit can nearly full of water, into which a considerable quantity of salt has been placed. Make the solution strong by putting in as much salt as the water will take up. Then stir with the cloth end of the cob till the salt is dissolved. After that bathe the gall with this cloth covered cornob, and the gall will soon be cured. The salt hardens the skin and contracts the gall, whereas if any kind of grease be rubbed on it will make the skin even more soft and tender. The gentleman who gives this cheap and easy cure for galled shoulders says, if the skin is rubbed off, remove the collar and let a dry film form over the exposed flesh before applying the salt water. Then the applications will not be so painful to the horse.

In 1872 as much as $40,000 was in one or two instances paid for a single cow during the great Shorthorn craze. It was nearly as bad as the tulip insanity in Europe 100 years ago.

There is quite too much eating of the knife in animal ailments.

Clean and oil your harness and keep it soft and pliable.
