A CAMP MEETING IDYL.

"Now Miss Wilder, 'bout them chickens?"

"Just let me knit to the middle of my needle, Draxy."

Draxy waited, her busy hands finding something to do in the little pause. The things on the table were straightened—the daguerreotypes (it was the best room) tilted more accurately on their open covers, a minute speck of dust dislodged from the mantlepiece—all before the gentle "click, click" of the needles, ceased and Mrs. Wilder laid down her stocking.

"The chickens—let me see. It was those six little brolls of the speckled hen's I was a thinking of, and the pepper-and-salt rooster." (Mrs. Wilder viewed chickens from a purely practical stand-point.) "That'll be enough, won't it?"

"I don't know—doubtfully—folks eat a heap at camp meetin'."

"So they do. Well, then, kill three of the black hens, and bake a pie. They'll make a plenty."

"I guess so." Business thus disposed of, Draxy assumed a chair and waxed confidential.

"How many of our folks is a-goin', Miss Wilder?"

"You and me and Mr. Wilder and Nathan and Ellen, that's five, and Lucy's six."

"Lucy!"

"Yes. Mr. Wilder said he guessed she'd better, and Brother Parker pleaded hard about it. He thinks she's old enough to get religion, and ought to have it, and her pa says there's no harm tryin', only he won't have her flustered. I don't know what to say 'bout it myself, but I guess pa's right." And Mrs. Wilder ended with a sigh.

"Mr. Parker!" There was a concentrated and conspicuous sniff in Draxy's voice. She said no more, and in another minute got up and left the room, her errand accomplished. There were few waste places in Draxy's life. Satan might have dodged round her for months without finding one idle chink in which to practice his nefarious arts.

Pretty soon the door opened and Lucy came in—a girl of seventeen, with the shy beauty of a wild doe in her hazel eyes. The delicate, cameo-like outline of her face was full of an expression of appeal. Not that there was anything to appeal against in her life, the petted only daughter of this honest home. Some women possess that look naturally, and before it, when combined with youth and loveliness, the hearts of men go down like nine-pins. Lucy as yet knew not the value of her dower, but such knowledge never lingers long.

"Where have you been dear?"

"Over to Esther's, mother. They're beginning the camp-meeting cake, and I stayed to help beat eggs."

"Do tell! I suppose they're making a great fuss, like all the rest of the folks?"

"Oh yes. Mrs. Robbins has killed a turkey and eight pairs of chickens, and had two pieces of beef boiled, and Esther and Hepsey were making gingerbread and raised cake, and all sorts of pies that you can think of—mince and apple custard and Canada-plum—I can't remember half."

"Land's sake! And who's going, Lucy?"

"Mrs. Robbins and the squire and the girls, and James and his wife, and Aunt Mirey, and"—here the happy girlish voice sank a little, just a little; only a close observer would have noticed the inflections—"and Kane."

"Elkanah! I want to know! Well, it's time he got hold of something good. You'll have to help Draxy make our pies to-morrow, dear. The weather's splendid. I guess we're going to have a good week."

This camp meeting, about which all Ammonoosuc was in a stir, was a yearly affair, planned for and anticipated with invariable pleasure. After the heat of the Summer and the toil of harvest, when the hay was in, the potatoes stored, the corn and corn-shucks safely housed—when the rye and wheat had gone to the mill and the "boarders" to their city homes—came in the beautiful September weather, this holiday which, half picnic, half religious exercise, brought neighbors together, brightened the links of church brotherhood and old friendships, and gave body and soul alike refreshment. But oh, what a different thing it was to the different people who were looking forward to it!

Mrs. Wilder and other good matrons of her stamp, viewed it as a species of sober jollification, combining much good cheer with some comfortable preaching and praying. A time too, for the exhibition of notable housekeeping—of pie crust and frilled fowls, which, duly partaken of, might impart to the occasion a certain toothsome solemnity.

Brother Parker, of Peaslegwasset conference, on the contrary, regarded it as a crucible in which souls should be melted and changed—a four days' opportunity, during which the doors of heaven should stand open for whomsoever pleased. In his thoughts he saw them enter, some stained and shrunken with sin, some pure and spotless as Lucy Wilder's; for Brother Parker thought much of Lucy's soul. Had it been contained in a body less fair, it had perchance occupied less of his attention; but he was a man, though a good one, and having twice tasted the sweetness of married life, he was naturally ready to try it again. Only—here he was firm—a minister's wife must be known to be of one mind with himself. She must belong to his church; and no temptation should induce him to lay such a snare and scandal in the path of his people as to marry a woman without religion. So Brother Parker looked forward eagerly to the coming week.

Elkanah Robbins was equally eager. A strong, brown, handsome fellow. He had been a wild boy, but of late had grown steady, and so attentive to his farm that the folks said, "Kane must be thinkin' of settlin'," only where, or with whom, nobody knew.

To Lucy and other girls the camp meeting was invested with a delightful vagueness, in which merry meals, rustling tree-boughs, sleeping under canvas, whispers, laughter, "good times" generally, mingled. In more than one young heart another and more secret element of bliss was consciously recognized. In Lucy's it was—Kane.
