BAVARIAN AMUSEMENTS.

How the Jolly Country People Pass the Long Pleasant Evenings.

As to amusement, you may trust a Bavarian not to be behind in that. The men meet almost nightly in the different inns, according to their status in the local societies, where they have talk, singing, music, cards, etc., the large glass mugs at their side being constantly replenished. The beer is light and wholesome, but the amount drunk is a serious expense. Besides these nightly gatherings there are different clubs or societies that meet at certain times at one or other of the inns for an evening's amusement, some of them under the patronage of the priest. In many of them the women join, but the women's chief entertainments are kunkl, or spinning parties at home, and very cozy and picturesque these spinning parties are.

The great feature in a Bavarian sitting room is the large porcelain stove that stands out into the room, and that is usually lit from the passage outside. Round this stove a bench runs, making a delightfully warm seat, the back being the porcelain stove. But besides this stove, in the older houses, there is in the wall a hole with a chimney, where a particular sort of pine, that burns brightly without sending out sparks, is burned at night for the purpose of light only.

In olden times, when such luxuries as lamps were unthought of, it was often the only means of illumination. Some still use them constantly; others keep them only for festive occasions. A man (generally the wag or story teller of the party) sits beside it to keep it replenished. The women have their spinning wheels or knitting, and the men sit in the darker corners, and there are always some to sing songs or tell stories or keep the fun going in some way. One such scene especially recurs to me.

Imagine an old, dark paneled room. In her armchair close to the stove, in the full light of the blazing pine wood, sits the handsome old hostess, in [illegible]
