SORE AT SALT LAKE.
Big Clearing House Showing Causes Sarcastic Denver Comment.

The expected has happened. In the table of bank clearings for last week Salt Lake City was left behind, and instead of clearing checks to followed by the banks, show a total in excess of that credited to Denver, where the season followed is one in which generous economy is the leading foible. The population of Denver is certainly well-nigh of 135,000—that of Salt Lake does not exceed 55,000. Yet Salt Lake's clearings for last week were $1,132,107, as compared with $1,121,600 credited to Denver. So we believe that the stale inventory surrounding Salt Lake is more apparently than real, that which is reached from here. Those items are of no small importance to the Salt Lake ear mark that which distinguishes Salt Lake City from the rest of the world in the advertising sense. It would be useless to ask the chamber of commerce to discontinue the use of the clearing house, but it would be a good institution consult the books in attempting to do so, for the sarcasm would cease to be, if it expressed.—Denver News.

POLICE COURT.

It took Judge Timpson and Prosecutor Diehl just twenty-five minutes to transact the business in the police court yesterday afternoon. Only two cases were before the court, one charged with being drunk, but had a good reason for being drunk, and the other charged with being a vagrant. The first case was that of Charles Ashton, who was charged with being drunk, but had a good reason for being drunk, and was dismissed. The second case was that of Charles Ashton, who was charged with being a vagrant, and was dismissed.

Charles Ashton, sworn, said: Yes, I was drunk, but I had a good reason for being drunk. I was in the Salt Lake City Cemetery, and I had been considerably exercised by the sad ceremonies that had taken place in the cemetery, and I had to drink a little to get my spirits up. I was not drunk. I was only a little tuk. I was not drunk.

Officer Thomas said he was drunk.

Charles Ashton, sworn, said: I was not drunk. I was only a little tuk.

Judge Timpson: Charge dismissed.
