FRANCE AND RUSSIA.

The Policy of the French Government Sustained

BY THE CHAMBER OF DEPUTIES.

Vaillant Protest Against Participation in the International Festivities at Kiel.

PARIS, June 10.—The question of France's policy in the far East was raised in the chamber of deputies today by M. Millerand, the socialist deputy, who renewed against Russia's policy what he termed "Muscovite peace." M. Millerand was supported by other extreme members of the chamber, who objected to the participation of France in the coming festivities at Kiel by reason of the alleged connection with the opening of the Kiel and North Sea canal.

The minister of foreign affairs, M. Hanotaux, replied amid tumultuous applause, while were not by national colors, "Gentlemen!" M. Hanotaux defended the presence of the French squadron at Kiel by saying the French sailors would rejoicing, and a warship in France, but a million soldiers in her strength and this would be a step to stand comparison with any other power.

Referring to the question of France's policy in the far East, M. Hanotaux said as his colleague, Admiral Gervais, had stated, the idea that even and French interests were less affected than they were the government would have considered it to be its imperative duty to intervene immediately after Russian interests were threatened. Nobody could be glad, he continued, to the dangers of a renewal of France's policy in refusing to support Russia at that juncture. He felt himself to be the faithful interpreter of the feelings of the country when he telegraphed to M. Montebello that France places her alliance in the first rank of her considerations, and the government of the republic would be unable to expect with a positive efficacy the views of the imperial government concerning the conditions of peace between China and Japan.

M. Hanotaux concluded by asking for the unanimous support of all the members of the Chamber, for he said, a policy of retirement would only weaken French prestige abroad.

M. Pirmon called in return for French support in the East, Russia would aid France to obtain the return of Egypt.

M. Goblet demanded the publication of the treaty of alliance with Russia, that was in existence. At this point, M. Hanotaux interposed, saying: "You are well enough as cannot publish it."

M. Goblet then continued his remarks, insisting that the visit of the French squadron to Kiel was the result of the intimate French co-operation with Russia and Germany in the far East. Formerly, he said, France had a policy of rapprochement with Germany so long as the disputed question of the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine remained unsettled.

M. Ribot concluded the debate by following all the remarks of M. Hanotaux.

The order of the day, approving the declarations of the government, was then adopted by 315 to 195, and subsidized adjourned the Chamber of Deputies adjourned.
