TURKS AND ARMENIANS.

A writer in a London magazine pictures the Armenians as a half-civilized people, living in burrows in the earth, passing their lives in agriculture or in petty trade, or, when rich enough, lending money at usurious rates to the Kurds, of whose depredations they complain. They are said to be uneducated, fanatical and immoral in the highest degree, practicing vices generally ascribed to the Mohammedans.

It is evident that the author has a purpose, but if his intention is to soften the sentiment against the Turks by emphasizing the dark shadows of social life among the sufferers of Armenia, he must fail for the reason that the responsibility for that condition chiefly rests with the ruling class—the Turks.

The Armenians met with everywhere in the coast cities of Asia Minor, where laws of civilization are of necessity recognized to some extent, and where, consequently, the characteristics of the race are given some freedom of development, these Armenians as a rule are diligent, hard working and beaming forth the keen intelligence peculiar to Orientals. Their linguistic skill is simply wonderful. They are progressive as far as circumstances will permit, longing for a place among the civilized nations. Their past history and their traditions inspire them with hope for the future. The race must be judged from the qualities they exhibit under favorable circumstances and not from the condition of the rural population in the relentless grasp of the monster of oppression which for centuries has wound its tentacles around them.

It is almost impossible for people living under the blessings of a free government to realize what despotism really is. Freedom of thought, of speech, of action becomes so natural that a different condition seems almost inconceivable. Even the groans from the depths of the abyss of oppression are likely to be misinterpreted as the rebellious utterances of malcontents, of which the world is full. One must have seen the misery in order to understand it. Fancy a country in which officials are authorized to seize every book, even Bibles, that have not a government "approved" stamped upon it; a country in which the villagers hide at the approach of a stranger, because they fear he has come to gather taxes; where officials with impunity lay hand on everything that is valuable, and where there, consequently, is no incentive to work for the sake of obtaining a competence; where everything beyond the bare necessities of a life in poverty must be hidden in caves or otherwise; where you cannot travel from one city to another without official permission; where you cannot trust a postmaster with a one-cent stamp, but must watch him until he has cancelled it and rendered it not worth while stealing. But these conditions prevail all over the Turkish empire. And worse still, neither the life nor the honor of the women is safe in the tracks of many of the bands that traverse the provinces for the purpose of gathering revenue for the central government. Both Mohammedans and Christians are constantly subjected to these methods, and when they are considered, it is clear that whatever spark of civilization or tendency towards progress still remains, is a strong indication of the possibilities of a marvelous development under favorable circumstances.

The sultan, only a few days ago, intimated that he was satisfied with this mode of ruling, and this is probably true. The Turks know well what they are doing. The fact is that the Ottomans, for some reason or other, do not increase in proportion to the Armenians. They would soon become a helpless minority but for the constant raids by the Kurds, who are decimating a population deprived of the right of possessing arms for their own defense. No one acquainted with the situation believes that the Armenians are innocent of atrocities, but the provocation is such that in any other country, a general uprising would long ago have taken place.

A new stage of the Turkish question is looked for tomorrow, Saturday, December 7, when the sultan must give a definite answer to the demands of England for a permit to send an extra gunboat to Constantinople. Will the sultan dare to refuse? The impression seems to be general that no one power except Russia is in a position at present to do more than threaten the Sublime Porte, and that Russia is merely biding her time for a decisive action. There is a tradition in the Mohammedan world that in the fulness of time the czar will restore the cross to the church of St. Sophia, and if we mistake not, the Turks fear Russia more than all the rest of Europe combined.

DANGEROUS FISH.

The connection between foul fish and disease has recently been pointed out by competent medical authority and emphasized in a bulletin by the U. S. Fish commission. The outbreak of cholera in 1893 in the fishing ports of Grimsby and Hull and several cases of death are traced to the consumption of stale oysters, cockles and various kinds of fish in a state of decomposition.

It is generally known that people who subsist chiefly on the yield of the sea, and who, as a general rule, are not noted for cleanliness, are prone to various diseases. In Astrakan, for instance, the place of the sturgeon and caviar, it is shown that the population would become extinct, were it not for the constant influx from other sources. In 1878, when cholera decimated the inhabitants, most of the fatal cases occurred among the laborers employed in fish salting. The poverty of these laborers is so extreme that bread is often beyond their reach, and they subsist chiefly on the inferior parts of the fish. The remains are left in accumulated masses to rot on the banks of the rivers and the atmosphere is further vitiated by the offal from fat boiling, fish oil and isinglass works. Measles, smallpox, scarlet fever and other fevers is the result.

It has been ascertained that wounds caused by the handling of decomposed fish are often very serious. In Norway the whalers know this and use harpoons poisoned by a putrifactive prepared from such material. When the whales are struck with the poisonous harpoons they show sign of exhaustion in twenty-four hours, supposedly as a result of septic poisoning, and are then readily captured. The harpoons are again recovered and preserved for future use.

From the facts observed it is evident that the question of putrid food is one of great importance. At many fish markets, where the ignorance of hygienic rules is great and, consequently, filthiness prevailing, fish is left ungutted and unbled until sold. The skin is repeatedly soaked so as to give it a bright appearance, but really hastening on the process of decomposition. What is exported to the markets in the interior is often infested by impure preservatives as unclean salt or ice from impure water. Bacteria are sure to be transported with it by these means.

It has further been proven that poisonous matter of this kind cannot be destroyed by boiling. There is therefore no way of avoiding possible danger in putrid food except by destroying it in properly constructed furnaces.

The conclusion drawn from all this is that decaying fish is one of the most potent factors in the production of disease. It is evident, however, that the dangers are of such a nature that by proper attention to the matter, they can be remedied. Fish, like other slaughtered animals intended for food, should be bled, properly cleaned and treated with pure preservatives. In this country this is more generally the rule than in other countries, and it is therefore a good deal more safe to use the home product than that from most foreign markets where fish is preserved for export.

A "MORMON" RELIC.

The following article is reproduced from the DESERET EVENING NEWS of June 29, 189[illegible].

A "MORMON" RELIC.

The NEWS has had a pleasant visit from Mr. A. H. Thatcher, formerly of Van Buren county, Iowa, but now of Rich Hill, Bates county, Missouri, who tells of the possession, and something of the history, of what he calls an old "Mormon" relic.

At the time of the exodus of the Latter-day Saints from Nauvoo, Mr. Thatcher, then a young man, was living near Keosauqua, Iowa, and distinctly remembers the presence and encampment of the exiled people on the neighboring prairie. A Mr. Phillips, who lived somewhat nearer the town, and three or four miles from the Thatcher farm, allowed one of the Mormon families to camp in his yard. They remained there some time, and before leaving they gave or sold to Mr. Phillips an old anvil of antiquated shape and style, but something which they appeared to value highly and only at last disposed of because their wagon was heavily loaded and the muddy roads made desirable the lightening of their burden in every possible way. Their affection for and reluctance to part with the anvil will be understood from the fact that it was at that time over four hundred years old. Upon its side appears the date of manufacture—1[illegible], also its weight—[illegible] pounds.

The age of the relic became gradually known in the vicinity, and Mr. Thatcher among others; this gentleman, besides being a blacksmith, was also a lover of antiquities, and he became the owner of it at the death of Mr. Phillips, when at an auction sale of effects he secured it after spirited bidding at a figure many times higher than the ruling price of anvils. Since then he has exhibited it at various county and state expositions and has won numerous premiums with it as being the oldest relic on exhibition. The most notable victory of this kind was in the centennial year, when the claims of a three-hundred-year-old Dutch oven, which seemed to have clear sailing for the first prize, were completely demolished by the four-hundred-and-seventy-year-old anvil. Its present weight is exactly thirty pounds, it having become somewhat lighter through losses of rust during its long and eventful career. But it is still an excellent condition, and for certain kinds of blacksmithing is much more convenient than the ordinary clumsy and stubby implement of the same name.

When it is recalled that the article described was made more than eighty years before the discovery of America by Columbus, and was probably brought to the New World by one of its earliest colonists, the anxiety to learn something more of its history prior to Mr. Thatcher's acquisition of it will be easily understood. The NEWS therefore takes pleasure in inviting inquiries as to whether any reader knows the name of the family who camped with Mr. Phillips near Keosauqua, Iowa, after the terrible expulsion from Nauvoo; and if there are any living members of the family, whether they can tell anything about the anvil they disposed of to him just before starting their journey westward to the mountains.

Upon the same subject we have lately received the following letter from Mr. Thatcher:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Nov. 20, 1895.

Dear Mr. Cannon:

I suppose you can remember my visit to your office about the 25th of June, 1895, and giving you a description of a Mormon relic I have in my possession; you published the same in your paper, which I received when I arrived home. Many thanks for the same.

Since leaving your beautiful and historic city, in which I got much at school in my short stay by the kindness of Mr. Wilson, of the Lion House, who showed me around, I have gained some more information about the old Mormon relic. I am now located here for the winter. After leaving your city I spent one day in Leadville, a season in Denver with relatives, and going on many interesting excursions, viewing the grand sights of nature with the added art of man, such as the Clear Creek canyon, Pike's Peak by the "cogwheel," the "Springs," caves, Garden of the Gods, etc., etc.; then a few days in Topeka, Kansas City, and at home, Rich Hill, Mo. Then, being urged by old comrades to meet with them at Louisville, at the national G. A. R. encampment, I did so, and spent a very pleasant month in Kentucky, Tennessee and southern Missouri.

After getting through with all of this, I concluded to spend the winter in Washington City, D. C., with a brother; have been here during this month, and am enjoying many things of interest. The other day I wrote to my old friend, Ira Phillips, in Iowa, a son of the man that owned the relic, asking him the names of the Mormons who lived in their yard. He said the man's name was Mallory—had forgotten the first name, but he had a son about 20 years old, by the name of Elisha. They stopped there two and a half miles south of Keosauqua, Van Buren county, Iowa, in the winter of 1845-6. The man had two wives. Now, if this will give you any clue to what you desire (as you seem to be interested, as I am myself), you are perfectly welcome to it, and can publish it, or any part, as you see fit, by putting it in grammatical order. I am well aware it needs it, as I was raised on the frontier, amongst the Indians. I have not the ability to put it in shape for publication. Now, if you find any more history regarding the relic I would be pleased to have a paper. Please send as follows and oblige yours,

MUNYON'S RHEUMATISM CURE.

Mr. L. C. Griffith Who Suffered for Years With Rheumatism and Heart Disease and Was Scarcely Able to Walk, States That He is Entirely Cured.

Mr. L. C. Griffith, Carrersville, Pa., says: "I was troubled with heart disease for years and at times had spells when I was like one dead, would sink away and become cold, helpless and unconscious. Two years ago I had erysipelas, and this was followed by a severe form of rheumatism which spread to all parts of my body. I could scarcely walk, my hands were so drawn out of shape that I could not use them, and I was almost a helpless cripple when I began taking Munyon's Rheumatism Cure. Our home physician had treated me for months without relieving me, but in five days after beginning Munyon's pills I could walk around, and now I am perfectly well. Munyon's Rheumatism Cure has made a complete and wonderful cure of all my troubles."

Munyon's Rheumatism Cure is guaranteed to be absolutely harmless and a strong tonic in building up the weak and debilitated. It cures acute or muscular rheumatism in from one to five days. Sharp, shooting pains in any part of the body stopped by a few doses. A prompt, complete and permanent cure for lameness, stiff back and all pains in hips and loins. Chronic rheumatism, sciatica, lumbago or pain in the back are speedily cured.

The Munyon Remedies act promptly and cure the most obstinate diseases. A separate cure for each disease. At all druggists, mostly at 25 cents a bottle.

Personal letters to Prof. Munyon, 1505 Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa., answered with free medical advice for any disease.
