HOW IT IS OBSERVED ALOND THE YUKON.

Been the British Northwesters Indians Celebrate the Glorious Fourth—A Land Where Squaws Rule—An Incident of Intermarriage—Copper Mines.

(By Associated Press Association.)

OLD FORT SELKIRK, British N. W. T., July 4, '91.—Fort Selkirk is an old abandoned trading station of the Hudson Bay company, one that had been deserted for nearly half a century. They found themselves pushing on the rainy preserves of the Chilkats who organized a war party, descended the river, burned the buildings and appropriated the goods. But while this landmark had almost disappeared another had sprung up alongside in a fine big house built by Mr. Harper, an American trader. I had hoped to find his boys, as his influence would have materially assisted us in our further explorations. Our original plan, in fact, had contemplated that our real explorations would begin at or near this point and bear from here towards the southwest. A straight line from here to previous explorations on the Copper would probably give the longest that could be laid down on this continent, wholly through unexplored country. Mr. Harper was gone for the summer down the river disposing of his furs and the station was in charge of a Takuch Indian, who introduced himself as "Sam." He understood a considerable amount of English, so his interpretation was often quite aggravating to us, but it was the best we could do. There were also two Indian boys. These were all the Indians in sight, so the chances of getting about a dozen to act as pilots for us on the Copper river did not seem flattering. Where others could be found was not so apparent, either. I induced the boys to dress up in certain regalia from the region around about, and have them come to render with me and have a feast. I had no faith in the conference on an informal basis. I knew they would come in from Hudson's bay on crutches for the feast. The boys got away the afternoon of June 27, so there was nothing to do but await developments. Next afternoon "Sam" informed me that a raft could be seen floating out of the Pelly river, and he believed it held some Indians that had probably been sent in by our messengers. They turned out to be our two members themselves. They said they found a camp on the Pelly but it contained only squaws. Some other Indians had been seen and they had sent in word they would not miss any feast. They had killed a moose and did not want to pack. I did not see any relevancy between the two, but they evidently did. About an hour after another raft was seen floating out. It had aboard a half dozen Indians who with a vast number of dogs were seen coming alongside. There was not a man among them fit for packing and they looked more like an ambulance load destined for a hospital than a working party. And sure enough their greatest demand was for medicine, and it never ceased while we were with them. The best we could spare readily, carbolated vaseline, we doled out in homeopathic quantities for everything from corns to consumption and from baldness to blindness, all of which it cured. I never saw a better example of faith cure in all my vast backwoods medical practice.

There was a great deal of free advice offered, but very few applicants for work; maps by the score were furnished as to the trail, but not a whisper uttered as to packing.

One curious piece of information arose, partially as a result of imperfect interpretation and partly from the direction we desired to go—that is to the Copper river. It was that there natives knew of a copper deposit somewhere near this river. Every time we spoke of Copper river they diverged off to the copper deposit. They seemed so persistent and as I finally believed the two places were near each other, I gave up any other idea except that of the latter, reasoning that if it could be attained the other would be close at hand as a result. There was one hardened old sinner among them calling himself Jackson who professed to know all about the region and the Copper river Chief, Nicolai. (Social he called him.) He said it was eighteen sleeps to the copper and seven from there to Mendale's fall he varied as to the number of sleeps with each map he drew and he was hopelessly very energetic. The variations as to the copper could be reconciled by assuming an equal number of scattered deposits, but it was hard to believe that Nicolai was an ubiquitous or had such a large number of horses as were needed to fulfill the other discrepancies in the matter. There was no doubt about there being a copper deposit somewhere by, which was evidenced occasionally by these people, for we found among them copper bullets, arrow-heads, a strip specially for dragging narrow cut on arrows and carbon bowlders and a bag of finely powdered azurite or the blue carbonate of copper. The latter was used by the ladies for fattening their cheeks and claim a remedy that I think is dying out a little faster than the tribe. They allege that if one of these strikes a bowlder of copper with a hammer or other implement he will see coon after. In some mysterious way they seem impressed with the idea there was bodily danger rubbed in the copper mine. At there there was a financial danger in feeling around any sort of a mine, but had never heard this specific charge before. Next morning "Jackson" collected to dress up some Indians for me in exchange for "Sam" he took along, but returned in the evening reporting he had been following a fresh moose trail all day and had forgotten everything about the Indians. He evidently wanted some meat to go with his bread. I put the two boys out again that evening, however, for the prospects were dismal. Some suggested squaws if necessary. At 8:30 squaws. Among most Indians the women are practically slaves doing all the work, but the most Indians of Alaska, however, are a conspicuous exception, their women ruling the property, the regal descent and in many other ways have rights unknown to civilized women. These Indians were. Among whom we found ourselves inured more towards the former than the coast tribes spoken of. An incident held up Hunter's 75 better than any general description. Two miners of the Yukon valley had married squaws, one (Smith) having married, his bride from the west, the other's (Jones's?) sweetheart having been an island maiden. Their companion's work over Smith and Jones slipped out together in two boats, up the river, to reach the coast. My informant passed them where there was good tracking and in the first boat was Mrs. Smith steering and Smith tracking should the tracking rope tangling along the bank, while just behind was Jones stretched out clearing his craft and Mrs. Jones playing his part of the tow-path mule. Next day four rafts floated out of the Pelly and the parties camped about a mile below us. These were fifteen to twenty in the whole party and our prospects looked more hopeless than they had. I gave them a day for reflection, then explaining my plan. An idea that has the contrast to pierce an Indian's exterior, not only how to get through a Pelly shoal and tough hole, but also a dense thicket of bush, so it is [illegible] given time unless that is with a [illegible]. A few others came in from [illegible] to day, but five pockets were the all I could reach, and all of them had chalk cables and stone windlasses attached to their pemmican. Worst of all, as tests proved, these windlasses would not be depended on for over 60 pounds each. It was mournfully evident the white men would have to do the cause if we ever expected to make a start. A carpenter, photographer or chronicler, etc., is more than handicapped who has to pack and attend to those duties while keeping along with a lot of roaring savages who have no more idea of those than they have of cosmology.

Independence day was passed on the Fourth of July this year and I was greatly surprised to find the savages had anticipated and were longing to celebrate it. I might have expected it in "Sam" who came from the Alaskan side, but where the others caught it the good Lord only knows. Here on the Queen's sacred soil the very savages were turning themselves loose out celebrating another country's separation from their sovereign, while inquiries showed that Her Majesty's birthday was unknown to them.

I think the Indians' desire to celebrate was based on an assignment sagacious to turn gunpowder and make noise, and that the patriotism in it. Has the result of the explosions was all smoke. Guns and pistols were blazing away at frequent intervals, and in the evening several tough stunts and legs were blown up in lieu of a national salute. I noticed one instance of the economy of physical exertion that rather impressed me. The problem was to bore a hole in a 300-pound stump with a two-pound auger. Two Indians carried the stump about 100 yards to the auger, bored the hole, then carried the stump back and blew it up in honor of the American eagle. If the American people knew not manage any better he would seat the world that now repose between his spliffed wings.

Horsewhipped Her Defamer.

Mrs. Laura E. Hall, wife of Minley Sept. Hall, of Burns City, Mich., horsewhipped George Moore of Charleston, Ill., at Brown's hotel in Chambersburg, W. Va., recently, for slander. Mrs. Hall had been living with her father-in-law, Dr. J. C. Hall at Charleston, and Moore had worked on the place. He became enamored of her, and endeavored to induce her to elope. She expelled him and he left Charleston and obtained employment here. Shortly after his arrival he began boasting of his conquest with Mrs. Hall, claiming that she had eloped with him and had lived several months with him as his wife. The reports reached the lady in Illinois, and she came 1,300 miles to protect her reputation. She is a very beautiful woman of about 25, and Moore is a dissipated man of 50.

There are six tunnels in the world which take a length exceeding 21,000 feet—St. Gothard, Mont Cenis, Hoosac, Severn, Nockstoogs and Sutro. St. Gothard, the longest, is 16,640 feet long, the shortest, is 21,192 feet.
