A PRAYER CARPET.

I know not where in Dagistan
Its kind, the skillful artisan
Who wove in some Persian way
This fabric where the vision plays
Across the mind in rainbow chaos,
Or asset and bank and labyrinth.

For do I know what significant hands
Plied patient there the tinted threads,
The while the intranced loom was turned
Toward Mecca and the unrolled carpet,
Borne by the rapt musician's cry,
Inspired, fleetfoot, up the transparent sky.

But this I know—that never shall press
Its mottled sentimental loveliness,
Its soul akin to cathedral chime
A velvet sense of holy things,
And moves on the modest floor
Are strands of woe and shrieks of prayer.

With kneeling morning rays, the sun
Its fleecy robes shows upon,
The stamps comes from the light, and all
Is inherited from the memory go,
A Persian flings a silver jot
A palm tree cries a cataracts.

But when night fills the space of day,
And twilight grows dole-dark,
My fancy shapes a forepaw man
From anchors on the Euphrates,
Thus, in the compass small I see
The Orient in epitome.

BEST FOOD FOR MEN.

WHAT SOME BRAIN WORKERS EAT IN ORDER TO DO GOOD WORK.

No Hard and Fast Rules Can Be Laid Down for Everybody—Individual Peculiarities Must Determine the Particular Food Needed for Each One.

Whether the old saying that a man's heart is reached through his stomach is or is not a true one, it is a scientific fact that the stomach is a highway to the brain. The exhilarating influence of a good dinner is sometimes shown in brilliant impromptu speeches, without a doubt. The cook is responsible for many of the accidents, the failures and successes of life. Not long ago a well known lawyer to outstrip up a case acquitted himself so wonderfully that the jury promptly brought in a verdict against his client. The lawyer afterward acknowledged that his sudden at breakfast were responsible for his having lost the case. They made him irritable and incident.

Curious to know upon what sort of food men of note do their best work, I recently interviewed some of the lights of the medical profession, law, commerce, theology and society.

Genial Dr. George F. Shrady, President Grant's stanch friend, declares that he must vary his food in order to develop and nourish, separately and collectively, the organs of his body.

"I have an excellent digestion and can take all kinds of food without feeling any discomfort," said he. "but I believe that the brain is most nourished by sleep and rest. If we gratify our intellectual tastes we are feeding the brain vastly better than by any sort of material food, and consequently obtain better results.

"A friend once bet me a jackpot a young author, who had been recommended to follow a strict diet of pumpkins. On this sort of fare he wrote a novel. Well, the offspring of pumpkins—crawled, belied and staggered—is still looking for a publisher to launch it on an unsuspecting public!

"No one kind of food exclusively is good for the ordinary man. 'Be healthy, wealthy and wise,' as the old maxim goes, study the likes and dislikes of your stomach and regulate your diet accordingly (as I do) and all will go well."

Judge Roger A. Pryor laughed heartily when told that every brainless lawyer in town was anxious to know whether his spirited speeches might be attributed to squab, lobster or partridge.

"Tell them from me," said Judge Pryor, "that I am extremely fond of birds and dainties generally and that lobster a la Newberg is a toothsome dish I don't despise and that my brain works best when I'm free from indigestion. Tell those young men to follow the old Roman maxim and secure for themselves 'a sound mind in a sound body.'

"Hot breads, salads, tea and sweets form part of my daily menu, and as they give my body strength I am able to do my allotted share of mental labor. The body must first be ministered to by food and exercise, and then the mind will soon be ripe for cultivation. The reason, memory and imagination must each be nourished with food. Theology, logic, law, mathematics, poetry or art. Upon the idiosyncrasies and constitutional peculiarities of each man depend the kind of food he assimilates."

Dr. H. P. Loomis thinks men pay too much attention to the specific uses of certain foods.

"Look at the enormous sale of phosphates and so called brain foods," said he. "There is nothing in them. If instead of wondering whether this, that or the other is good for him a man would simply follow the dictates of his own appetite we would be much better off. Nature places a safeguard upon excess by creating the sensation of satiety.

"When I have eaten some rich food that causes me some annoyance I take a horseback ride or other pleasant exercise and rid myself of the ill feeling, and in the future avoid that food. Which turned a venison that caused the trouble. Rest is really the best tonic for the brain. In two words I would give this prescription for happiness—'Avoid worry.'"

A prominent member of Congress, a really brainy woman, declares that the amount of food people require or think they require is largely a matter of habit. Said she: "It is possible to train the stomach to do with very little or to make its requirements border on the margin of gluttony. When the hunger is satisfied, brain achievements depend upon heredity and environment, not to them must be attributed all success or failure. The gardener who only cares for the blossoms of his plant instead of directing his efforts to the root, will have but very fruit as a reward. Let scientists look to their physical surroundings, and the mental and moral are sure to follow."

The Rev. Dr. Henry Van Dyke, the author and clergyman, believes the brain to be tenderly appreciative of all kindness shown to the stomach, and calling and encouraging when the latter is oppressed. "In the same time all humorous must be made for individual tastes.

"My food," he said, "must be taken at regular intervals and be largely of the farinaceous kind, while meats, generally, may be taken when and as you chose. A single sandwich of caviar would incapacitate me for several hours. So, I say, be kind to the machinery of the body. After all, the best diet for the brain is a constant variety in the quality and quantity of our intellectual food.

There seems to be no particular edible which holds a magic power over the realm of thought but by selecting food with a view to digestibility, in time, the mind, free from the body is aided in performing its various functions, and the brain, with its other organs, is then enabled to discharge its duties properly as well.—New York Herald.

Agricultural chemists estimate the nutriment of 100 pounds of cotton seed meal as equal to 350 pounds of corn or to 387 pounds of wheat bran.

Not So Poor After All.

A Washington capitalist who has recently returned from the interior of Florida tells the story of his trip. Having obtained the title to a tract of land by what "Colonel Carter of Cartersville" calls "some very ungentlemanly foreclosure proceedings," he set out to view his possessions. In the midst of a swampy waste he found a very dilapidated cabin. In the doorway hung a worn gray blanket and over the top of this blanket a grizzled "cracker" looked out at his visitor. The tenant surveyed his landlord and the landlord his tenant for a moment, until the latter broke the embarrassing silence: "Stranger," he said, "I ain't so poor as you think I be. I don't own this hornstead."—Washington Post.

The Little One's Version.

"In my Sunday school class," said a bright young woman, "is the sweetest little cherub you ever saw. She is much younger than the other boys and girls, but she seems to remember in my class. Some days ago I introduced each of the little ones to memories a verse or sentence from the Bible. Knowing that the infant brain could not retain a long sentence the mother of my youngest pupil gave the child the blessed text in the good book—'Jesus wept.' The following Sunday I called upon the class to fulfill my introduction. Finally I came to Margaret. 'What is yours, my dear? I asked. 'Jesus Kiss,' she lisped."—Kansas City Times.

WHERE MAN DARE NOT INTRUDE.

One Part of South American Theatres Reserved Solely for Women.

The great opera house, Teatro Solis, the pride of Montevideo, is an enormous building, with a pillared portico in front and a pair of huge oval wings, the whole covering an entire square. One of the wings serves as a splendid wine and billiard saloon, the other contains the National museum. On the second floor of the main building is a foyer of truly "magnificent distances," furnished with tables and chairs for those who wish to smoke and drink.

The oval shaped auditorium is very handsome, capable of seating 4,000 people, with five tiers of boxes decorated in red, white, green and gold. The fourth circle is the camela (gallery), reserved for ladies alone, after the peculiar fashion of all Spanish-American countries, as well as old Spain. Not even an archbishop or a dictator could gain admission to the sacred precincts of the camela, and night after night it is filled with the beauties of Montevideo, escorted thither by their husbands, fathers and brothers, who leave them at the door and go away to spend the evening as they like elsewhere or take seats in the gentlemen's gallery above, but being dead sure to return before the close of the performance to see their ladies safely home.

Though men may not enter the charmed circle, no jealous rules can be rigorous enough to control the southern propensity to flirtation, which, like murder, "will out," the more surely because of the matchless notions of seclusion, handed down from their Moorish ancestors, that cavilon aristocratic females. It is said that most of the matches of Montevideo are made, not in heaven, as the old saw goes, but in this gallery, though the ladies have no chance to extend their flirtations beyond the point of meeting eyes and telegraphic communications with fans and flowers and handkerchiefs—a language natural to youth the world over, as birds fly how to build their nests without instruction.

Though a gentleman dare not speak to the fair enslaver whom he has been staring out of countenance night after night at the opera, he can follow at a respectful distance when the author of her being hurries her home, discover where she resides and thereforth prance before her windows and become her shadow when she goes to church or promenades in the plaza. The middle-class god "laughs at lockmarks" in Uruguay as does here, and though a lover may not call upon the object of his devotion, they manage it somehow—possibly with the more experienced and success because no opportunity is afforded for compatibility before marriage.—Montevideo Cor. Pittsburg Dispatch.

AS GOOD A DIAMOND.

Here is an easy means of determining whether a supposed diamond is genuine or not. Pierce a hole in a card with a needle and then look at the hole through the stone. If false you will see two holes, but if you have a real diamond only a single hole will appear.—New York Herald.
