EGGS IN WINTER.

Profitable Feeding and Management of Poultry in Cold Weather.

A comfortable poultry house can be cheaply and expeditiously made in the corner of a barn, shed or any outbuilding. It should be cheerfully lighted and face the south or west if convenient. Tarred felt paper makes a good lining and is cleanliness to vermin. The house should be divided into pens, large enough to hold twenty fowls and no more. Fowls do better in small colonies. The laying stock must not be crowded, or they will not be layers long. The temperature in the coldest weather should be high enough to keep the water from freezing—at any rate, warm enough to prevent the combs of the layers from freezing. A wooden floor is better than any other kind. In the cold weather the best earthen floor will get damp and keep us, and damp is disease and death to poultry.

The best roost is a 2 by 4-inch scantling, put lengthwise over two 12-inch boards. Sometimes a platform is used to catch the droppings, which are manure is worth seventy-five cents to one dollar per load. Heavy fowls should not have to jump more than eighteen inches. Each pen should contain a dust bath, as that the fowls can roll in the dry dust and keep down lice. A small box to hold broken oyster shells, old mortar, gravel, crockery broken into small pieces, etc. Some of these substances are absolutely necessary to furnish grit to grind up the food. They are the hen's teeth. A certain amount goes to furnish lime for the egg shell, but much of the lime for this purpose can be given in the shape of proper food.

The hens should be kept in constant activity. A lazy hen is never a laying one. Cut straw, hay, chaff or dry leaves should be scattered liberally on the floor of each compartment, and in this all grain feed should be thrown, so that the hens will be kept scratching for it. A cabbage suspended from the roof or ceiling high enough so make the hens jump at it is a capital way of keeping them busy. Occasionally substitute a piece of cow's liver. Edible or any tough sort of meat for the cabbage. In very cold weather the chill should be taken off the water for drink.

Laying fowls require plenty of fresh water, hence the importance of having the house warm enough to prevent water freezing. Take away all the male birds from the laying pens. The cock bird is a nuisance in the pen of layers. He not only monopolizes the most of the food, but spoils the hens by break eggs, and by hens by cock birds. Besides, the attendant cock is tantalizing for hens, and will run him as a leader.

In this cold weather of winter a warm meal in the morning is necessary to start and keep up a steady supply of eggs. A good plan is to throw all the waste of the kitchen, in the shape of meat scraps, pieces of bread, tomatoes vegetables, etc., into a pot, heat up in the morning till nearly boiling, and then mix bran, provender, shorts, or whatever is most abundant or cheap on the farm, into the hot mess, during in a small quantity of red pepper before mixing. Let the mixture stand for a few minutes until the meal is nearly cooked; then feed in a clean trough, with table ware it to keep the hens from jumping in and fouling or wasting the feed in their eager anxiety. Feed only enough of this soft stuff to hurry satisfy, never enough to gorge.

When a hen has had as much food that she will go into a corner and mope she has had too much, and if the overfeeding is continued will soon cease to lay. The laying hens are the active ones. If food is given at noon it should be eaten, and scattered among the litter on the floor. This meal should be light. The last feed in the afternoon should be generous. Each hen should be sent to roost with a full crop to carry her over all the night. Green food in the shape of vegetables, mostly grown on every farm, will be relished by the layers. Cabbages, turnips, carrots are generally the most consistent. Small potatoes boiled and mixed with provender or bran is a good change for the morning meal.

Some of the above named vegetables should always be in the pens of the layers. There is no danger of their eating too much. Red clover hay steamed, chopped and mixed with bran and given while hot is one of the healthiest foods for the morning meal. Meat in some shape must be given at least twice a week, to furnish blood making material. Hens fed on meat lay well. If given no meat the hens will eat their eggs and pick feathers from one another. In cold weather warm the grain feed.

What would be generous and stimulating diet for Leghorns, Minorcas and others of the Spanish family would be too fattening for Plymouth Rocks or Brahmas. As before stated, give enough to keep the hens active. Where meat is given it is not necessary to give so much grain. For instance, if meat is fed at noon it will be only necessary to scatter a few handfuls of oats in each pen to keep the hens at work. When a hen becomes too fat she will lay soft shelled eggs. Where plenty of meat is to be had as one of the cheapest articles of food a greater quantity of oats may be given. Wheat is the best all round feed. The waste of the farm in conjunction with meat and the hot morning meal and evening will bring plenty of eggs.

Devoid question the best all round food for the farmer is the Plymouth Rock. The two best breeds are the Plymouth Rock and the White Leghorn, for the reason, as the tables published in a preceding part of the report prove, that the Plymouth Rocks put on flesh more rapidly, and the White Leghorns lays more eggs than any other of the standard breeds. Closely following come the White Cochins. The cock bird is fierce and brave. Then follow the Brahmas, but they are slowly in developing. Another advantage to keeping Plymouth Rocks and Leghorns is that while the Plymouth Rock hens are hatching, pullets are laying all winter, the Leghorns being sometimes will go on laying, and pay the expense incurred while the other breed is sitting.—Report of Ottawa Central Experimental Farm.

Washing Calls.

"Observer" lays all blame for week calls at feeding time to the treatment of the stallion during winter. I consider with The Gazette's comments, but think if "Observer" would observe he might find that the mares were short of exercise with too much corn, corn fodder, clover hay and fat to produce healthy, strong foals to the cover of any horse in any condition. My experience teaches that in nine cases out of ten it is the wintering of the mare that kills the colt.

OLD TOM'S CHRISTMAS DINNER.

He Had Set Out to Eat 'Possum, but He Had His Misgivings.

I had been invited to eat dinner that Christmas with the colored. While we were waiting for the meal to be served the colored regaled me with a 'possum story about "a nigger I owned befo' the war."

"You see," said he, "old Tom was very fond of 'possum, and would go to any length to secure one for his dinner. It was just befo' Christmas in '61, I think, that Tom managed to capture a large, fat 'possum, which he skinned and prepared for cooking on Christmas day. When all was ready he went into his cabin, took his pipe out of the locker and soon had it roasting on the spit. Some sweet potatoes were added to the mess, and old Tom's eyes fairly rolled with delight as he thought of the feast in store for him.

"The prospect pleased him evidently caused Tom to feel drowsy, for in a few minutes Tom was sound asleep and snoring at a great rate. Through a chink in the cabin a pair of eager, envious eyes had been taking in the scene. The eyes belonged to another nigger of mine named 'Big Jim.' Well, the sight was more than Jim could stand. The calm down was duly opened, and in Jim stalked. 'Tom' said he as neared the sleeper, and lifting up some of the 'possum juice he smeared old Tom's lips and face with them and then hurried out. Very soon Tom awoke. In a stupefied way he looked around him, saw the bones and potato skins lying about and smacked his lips as he tasted of the 'possum fat, with which Jim had smeared his face.

"'Dreamt,' said Tom, in great bewilderment, 'dat's de bones and dat yere taste like 'possum, but somehow' (putting the region of his stomach) 'it don't sigree as if any 'possum was down yere.' 'Yes I know' have eat 'em' but I'm pow'ful hungry all the same. I'm pow'ful sot dat 'possum while I'se asleep.' With this reflection Tom rolled over and went to sleep again."—New York Herald.

Georgia's Strongest Man.

Jim Murphy, an old time White, familiarly known as "Big Foot Jim," living on Bridge creek, in Colquitt county, is said to be the biggest and strongest man in Georgia. He weighs 300 pounds, stands 7 feet in stockings, and wears a No. 15 shoe. He is possessed of phenomenal strength. On several occasions he has been known to easily twist the horns of some off. He is a great hunter, and spends most of his time in that way.—Columbus Sun Inquirer.

An Evidence of Intellect.

"Is he a clever man?"

"Well, I should say so. He can raise money on a person's note and then borrow enough from the same man to pay the interest upon it."—Texas Siftings.

A Youthful Warrior.

After the defeat of the Chili government troops at the battle of Concon, Vina del Mar, near Valparaiso, a little lad of eight or nine years of age, but less than that in stature, arrived in the town of Vina del Mar and gave a tolerably circumstantial account of the fight. At first his story was not believed, but little by little his tale was credited and listened to with astonishment that a child of his tender age should have been present at such a sanguinary encounter.

He quite artlessly stated that when the San Fernando battalion left the town with banners flying and band playing he imagined the troops were going out to skirmish, and followed them till he found himself on the field of battle. When the defeat and rout ensued he joined a group of stragglers, and at last found his way back to Vina del Mar, by way of Quilpue, at which place somebody gave him a piece of bread and a drink of water.—London News.

Various Uses of Cork.

Immense quantities of crude cork are brought into this country and cut by machinery. The crude cork varies from half an inch to 2 1-2 inches in thickness, and it is of many qualities. The finest quality is cut up by hand into wine corks; the cheaper qualities are cut by machinery into "soda corks," cork soles and what not. There is an enormous sale for small corks such as are used by druggists, and tons of cork are used every year in eyeglass dips. Only the finest cork is used for this purpose, and it is difficult to obtain a proper quality.—New York Sun.

A Lobster Five Feet Long.

"One rarely hears of a good sized lobster nowadays," said an ichthyologist. "Yet it was not so many years ago that twenty-five pounders were quite frequently caught. There is one preserved in the collection of crustacea at the Smithsonian institution which weighed eighteen pounds at the time of its capture. Reliable record exists of specimens weighing forty pounds. One of that magnitude would be five feet in length, including the claws."—Washington Star.

Not Conclusive Evidence.

On a Niagara street car the other night was an aged Irishman who held a pipe in his mouth. The conductor told him he could not smoke, but he paid no heed. Presently the conductor came into the car and exclaimed with a show of irritation, "Didn't I tell you you couldn't smoke on this car?"

"Well, O'as not smokin."

"You've got a pipe in your mouth."

"Sh O'l have me feet in me boots, but O'm not walkin."—Buffalo Courier.

Paid in His Own Coin.

A Gardiner pastor who had collected 1,400 copper cents during his itinerancy passed them over to a merchant in that city the other day, and was surprised soon after to receive 1,000 of them back again in the shape of a wedding fee.—Lewiston Journal.

THE PRISONER WAS ASLEEP.

A Remarkable Case of Hypnotism Comes to Light in a Paris Police Court.

We read frequently of judges falling asleep during the hearing of a case, but for a prisoner to lie slumbering peacefully during the whole of his trial is probably an unprecedented occurrence. This curious spectacle was witnessed in the Tenth police court, Paris, where a man named Emil David was charged with illegally personating a barrister and common swindling.

After giving his name in answer to the magistrate, the defendant ceased to reply to the question put to him, and his counsel explained to the court that David was fast asleep, although his eyes were wide open.

The magistrate was, of course, rather suspicious of such an explanation, and in order to prove that his client was not shamming Maître Raynard placed his hands before the prisoner's eyes and, drawing them slowly back, caused him to get up and leap over the barrier which separated the dock from the court. He was led back to his seat, but it was found quite impossible to awake him.

The trial, however, was proceeded with and Maître Raynard, in David's defense, explained that he was a highly hysterical hypnotic subject, and that at times he would remain for long periods in what is known as the "automatic ambulatory" stage of the disease.

The means that the patient, although in a state of complete somnolence, acts like an ordinary individual, and can travel, carry on a conversation or play cards without any one suspecting that he is asleep. On awakening, however, he is entirely unconscious of what he has done while in that condition.

This David on one occasion traveled from Paris to Troyes without being conscious of doing so, and on recovering his senses discovered that he had lost his overcoat, with a sum of money in one of the pockets.

He had no recollection as to where he had left the garment, but some months later, on telling his story to a surgeon at the Hotel Dieu, the latter artificially threw David into a state of hypnotic sleep, during which he explained the position and number of the room in a hotel at Troyes where he had left the coat. The landlord was communicated with and the story found to be perfectly correct.

The hearing of the case was terminated some time before David could be awakened, and the passing of the sentence was delayed for two hours, as the court did not wish to condemn a sleeping man.

Finally, when he recovered his senses, the prisoner was informed that on account of his extraordinary temperament his offense would be visited only with a penalty of one month's imprisonment.—Belfast News Letter.

For Curtain Bands.

For curtain bands many use bent chairs, others use cord or silk ribbons. It is not usual to work them, but occasionally the bands are shaped, inclosed with satin on a strong foundation, and jewelled with daisies or other flowers. Sometimes ribbon is embroidered.—Decorator and Furnisher.
