LACE GOWN OF FLOUNCING AND PLAIN NET.

There is always an ethereal and daintily feminine suggestion about the lace gown, and though all women love these delicate creations, the handsome robe-dresses of pattern lace are usually rather costly when of refined character. A charming lace gown has been evolved in this instance by the use of deep flouncing in combination with plain net on which rows of small crochet balls give a rich effect. Insertions of narrow lace are also introduced in the lower part of the skirt and a yoke of net and lace finishes the bodice. The sleeves, formed of the flouncing, are especially dressy and effective.

CLUB CHAT

Next week a district federation meet- will be held at Provo, and the officers of the state federation and a number of officers of the Women's clubs in Utah, will be the guests of the Provo club women. The session will be held on Thursday, May 6.

In Woman's World.

Europe represents to the American woman a great shopping counter, a department store, at which it is always bargain day, says Virginia Frame in the Delineator for May. Armed with the necessary funds, however much she may have steeled herself against yielding to temptation, she is soon indulging in a perfect orgy of delightful shopping. "For things were so cheap, my dear," she confesses to a friend after returning home, "it would have been a sin to leave them!"

If the traveler sails on a Mediterranean steamer, a route proving popular for spring traffic, her shopping begins before she is even landed at Naples, for most of the large liners touch at Gibraltar, which picturesque little seaport, as every one knows, is a cosmopolitan town where one can "pick up" all sorts of fascinating souvenirs in the by-ways that re semble the streets of Cairo at our fairs.

Then comes Naples—Naples of flowers and song, Naples of the blue waters and the pink coral. Every little window is filled with coral from the cold white beads or the palest blush tints to the rose and deep reds of pendants and chains. Veil-pins, hatpins and brooches are offered at every street corner and every church door. The shopper begins her first bargaining when she finds that the longer she hesitates the lower will be the price.

Rome is the magazine of antiquities—antiquities ancient and modern, antiquities dug up from among the old ruins, or antiquities manufactured around the corner. And what does it matter so long as your purchase is beautiful, and the caressing voice of the shopkeeper assures madame that she is getting one of the few real old treasures and for a price—holy Madonna! as could never part with it were it not for the little ones at home.

The Roman cameos are very lovely, and no one leaves Rome without a string of Roman pearls, pure and creamy in color and defying the unskilled eye to tell them from the real pearls. The Roman scarves and silks reflect the Italian skies and flowers in their hues and will brighten the waite lawn next Summer and let people know "we've been to Italy."

The shopper sails from Liverpool on a steamer that touches at Queenstown. Perhaps she has saved $20 to see her through the customs and into her own home. But she had not reckoned on Queenstown, for, though the steamers do not go up to the wharfs, hordes of lace venders come out to the liners in small boats with Irish lace and Irish blarney, a combination that is hard to resist. "John will meet me at the landing, anyway," the shopper reflects, "and he'll not expect me to have a cent." And, so as not to disappoint John, she buys just a little crochet, a set of baby Irish, a little Carrickmacross—and the steamer's off. There is a panic at the thought of the custom-house officials, but John is there to help her through and her best friend is at the dock.

"Didn't you love Paris?" asks the friend enviously.

"Adored it," replies the shopper.

"And the Louvre—didn't you love the 'Mona Lisa'?"

"I don't remember the 'Mona Lisa,' but enthusiastically, 'the feather hats were beautiful!'"

For never in my experience in the dressmaking world has there been such a remarkable latitude in the choice of fashions opened out to women. The mediaeval and Renaissance styles meet the follies and foibles of the Directoire and Louis XVIII periods in perfect amity over the teacups. A glimpse into a smart restaurant leaves one with the confused impression that some ambitious artist has tried to present the history of dress of the last twelve centuries on a single canvas.

Varied as the fashions are, all of them are conventionalized more or less, so that those of bygone days blend with the present styles into a curious composite type that is very interesting. They have all the puzzling charm of a half-remembered face that teases you with its familiarity and yet exasperates you with its strangeness.

It is the women today who make the success of the individual theater and the individual play. If any doubt as to that exists in any one's mind, witness the attendance of these very theaters when immoral plays are running. Out of six such in New York, reported by the Delineator, not one but showed an attendance of from one-third to one-half of women. And as these women in the great majority were accorted there as the guests of the men, either their wives, sweethearts or friends, it stands to reason that the men would accept the future of the women as to what play she would wish to see.

We repeat what Mr. Charles Burnham, president of the Association of Theater Managers, says: "No play can exist that is not patronized by women" and we add to it, No play can exist that is not patronized by good women. There are not enough of the other kind to keep any show running. If, therefore, the good women of this great country will awake to their responsibilities in this one thing, if they will themselves refuse to attend, if they will use their influence to persuade their women and men friends not to attend any show of the kind they will drive from the stage every indecent, indecent, immoral or impure play. In that act they will be casting votes effectively for a great moral reform and will build a platform on which they can well stand and claim to speak for what the better women everywhere think.

One line of work which women have recently taken up is noteworthy. It is said to be about twenty-five women engaged in this work in the United States. They have come into it from various lines, some of them having been at it for three years and have met with unexpected success.

It is hard work, but the remuneration compares favorably with that of the professions in which women have taken up recently. As civil engineers, for instance, they are receiving compensation ranging from $15.60 to $19.75 a week.

SALT LAKERS IN GOTHAM.

(Special Correspondence.)

NEW YORK, April 25.—Again has Maud Adams scored in a college town. Monday, April 26, the entire "What Every Woman Knows" company appeared in New Haven, giving a performance of the play in aid of the building of the Yale theater. Miss Adams assumed the entire expense of taking her company there, giving her services to help the college boys establish a theater on the same plan as the one at Harvard. It will be remembered that Miss Adams gave "Twelfth Night" at Harvard a year ago. The same enthusiasm was shown in Yale by the faculty and students that greeted her efforts last year in Cambridge. After each act Miss Adams was called again and again before the curtain and once she thanked the Yale men for their invitation to play for them. Flowers in great profusion were showered on her and Max Parry, president of the dramatic association, stepping out of a box, elected her an honorary member and presented her with a medal of the association. He also led in the cheering of three "Maud Adams" and then all joined in singing "For God, Our Country and Yale." With hurried leave taking of the Rev. and Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, whose guest she had been, and the enthusiastic audience, Miss Adams and her company made hurried exits to reach the train, waiting for them to make the run to New York in time for the evening performance at the Empire.

The coming week sees the departure of Mrs. Nettie T. Sloan and little son Richard, and Miss Phyllis Thatcher, her sister, for their homes in Logan, Utah. Both have finished their course in music. Mrs. Sloan has been studying piano with Joseph and vocal with Prof. Zenger. Miss Thatcher resumed her work with the violin with her old teacher, Lichtenberg. Both have been hard at work all winter with their music. A rest of a few months is needed before Mrs. Sloan begins work in the Agricultural college. Mrs. Sloan and Miss Thatcher, although students, have taken part in church exercises, always willing to lend their talents for the benefit of the meeting, and their presence will be regretted by everyone. It is hoped next winter will see them back in New York in their old quarters on Morningside avenue.
