SOME HISTORIC CANALS.

The canal is an ancient institution. It co-exists with the remotest periods of human history, since the primitive man discovered the value of an artificial waterway across a peninsula, or from one remote stream to the navigable waters of another. Historians allude to these artificial channels as existing in Egypt and elsewhere in the far away centuries preceding the Christian era. In the year 1829 the Chinese completed an imperial canal that traversed a distance of one thousand miles, a fifty days sail for the Mongolian junk. In the year 1681 the famous Languedoc canal was completed. This gave France an artificial waterway one hundred and forty-eight miles in length, with a summit level of six hundred feet above the sea, and including upwards of one hundred locks and fifty aqueducts. In Great Britain Roman spades dug the first canal, one or more of which are holding water today. The canals of the United Kingdom now exceed 4,000 miles in length, and are among the best of their kind in the world. The Manchester canal, now in course of construction, will, when completed, be a masterpiece of enterprise and engineering skill, and will place the Manchester manufacturer in direct and unbroken communication with the ocean. The North Holland canal was completed in 1825 and is fifty miles in length. The Amsterdam and other artificial waterways are among the most vital vitalizers of Dutch commerce and prosperity. The Suez canal, which, up to the date of its completion, was the most stupendous undertaking of its kind in modern history, extends from Port Said on the Mediterranean to Suez on the Red sea, the whole length of navigation being eighty-eight geographical miles.

This trans-Egyptian waterway is navigable by steamers 400 feet in length and fifty feet beam, the cost of this gigantic enterprise, including it harbors, being about $100,000,000. In the Western hemisphere, both in the United States and the Canadas, the inland canals has long been an economic necessity, and in the Erie and Welland, etc., we have examples of their service. In a strictly national sense we have the magnificent mistake of Panama, with its big holes and insolvent stockholders. At Nicaragua American enterprise is already at work. The importance of this canal to the United States and to other commercial nations as a route between the Atlantic and Pacific, is probably beyond any present calculation, and is of so undeniable a value that, in the engineering difficulties what they may, the consummation of the idea is among the historic certainties of the future.

Envilage in Stacks.

The Scotch or English practice of stacking hay and then subjecting it to pressure by weights or by windlasses, drawing together chains or ropes attached to cross timbers under and over plank floorings, seems to be successful there, but is not adapted to this country with its variable climate and extremes of temperature. Experiments made in New York state and Massachusetts, according to The Country Gentleman, showed much loss in spoiled envilage—in one case nearly two-thirds of the stack; and this wastage, even if much less, will doubtless offset the cost of a good silo.
