COLIC IN HORSES.—Dr. D. L. Phares contributes the following on colic in horses to Field and Factory:

Symptoms and Diagnosis.—The most prominent symptoms is intermittent spasm of the muscular coat of those parts of the large intestine known as the cecum and colon. Pain is constant, but the spasm recurring every few minutes renders it intolerable. The animal looks round at the side of flank, runs violently a short distance, lies down and rolls, or falls suddenly and sometimes springs up suddenly, and they even would tie their own belly by violently kicking it. In the intervals between the paroxysms the pain is comparatively slight, so that the animal may nibble grass. The disease must be distinguished from gastritis, enteritis and peritonitis, with which it has some symptoms in common. In the latter, too, the pain is uniform and constant, the belly hot and extremely tender to the touch, and the pulse accelerated, while in colic the pulse and temperature of the belly are little affected, and pressure on the belly relieves the pain. The attack of colic is also more sudden than the other affections named, in these the horse may kick toward his belly, as in colic, but is careful not to hit it. In gastritis there is less pain, less distension of the belly and flanks, less inclination to fall down, roll or run, and all his motions are slower than in colic. In gastritis the horse puts his mouth on the ribs nearer the shoulder; in colic nearer the flank. In gastritis nausea, distress and disgust are sometimes manifested by everting the upper lip repeatedly in a ludicrous way.

In spasmodic colic we find all the symptoms above indicated greatly intensified, except that there is no very great distension, while in flatulent colic the agony of the paroxysms is less, but the distension of the belly extreme. The signs of colic from impaction are the same as in the last, but the attack is preceded for some days by constipation, the feces being voided with difficulty in small, hard, dry lumps, not unfrequently being coated to some extent with tough mucus.

Treatment.—One remedy I have used successfully for twenty years in all the varieties of colic, and it happens to be adapted to all. I have repeatedly published this remedy, and it is now extensively used in most of the States. One tablespoonful of powdered nux vomica, in a gill each of warm water and whiskey, will cure every case if promptly given. Where there has been delay, and the stomach loaded with other things, a second dose may be required in twenty minutes. If the powdered nux vomica cannot be obtained promptly, saw or rasp up one or two of the large buttons and give as above. I would not give more than two large buttons, or two table-spoonfuls of the powder. Brandy, or other spirit equal in strength to good whisky, may be substituted for the latter, but the spirit and warm water are both very important in developing promptly and effectively the virtues and powers of the drug.

Tartar emetic is adapted to all the varieties of colic, and is highly recommended by General W. L. Brandon as a sure cure. A tablespoonful is ordered, and not more than two doses to be given within an interval of an hour. The antimony relaxes the whole system, and sometimes sickens the animal very much.

Sulphuric ether, in doses of two ounces, is a good remedy in spasmodic or flatulent colic. Chloroform, in like doses, is much more certain and prompt. It should be given in thin mucilage or milk. An ounce of laudanum may be combined with it with advantage in some cases. Although the first, perhaps, who had the temerity, as it was considered many years ago, to administer chloroform internally, I do not appreciate it so highly as many others do. I have seen animals considerably damaged by drenching with it, when awkwardly done. Besides it intoxicates the animal considerably. On one occasion, when far from home, my horse having flatulent colic, I gave him an ounce of laudanum and two ounces of bicarbonate of soda in a bottle of water, then tied tobacco on the bit, mounted and rode on. The colic was soon cured. Another good remedy for this variety is powdered grains of paradise and caraway seeds, each one or two teaspoonfuls, and twenty drops oil peppermint or an ounce of the essence, given in thin, warm mucilage.

In Europe, veterinarians give for spasmodic colic sulphuric ether, one ounce; laudanum, two ounces; compound decoction of aloes, five ounces. Mix and give every half hour until relief is afforded. Another good remedy they use is aromatic spirit of ammonia, one ounce and a half; laudanum, two ounces; tincture of ginger, one ounce and a half; hot ale, one quart. Mix and give every hour. At the same time diligently apply hot water to the abdomen, and by enema administer as much water at 100 degrees Fahrenheit as the bowels will hold, without using too much force.

In England, the following is also highly commended in both spasmodic and flatulent colic: spirits of turpentine, four ounces; linseed oil, twelve ounces; laudanum, one ounce and a half. Mix and give every hour till the pain ceases. Warm water enemas often bring away vast quantities of gas, and thus relieve. Sometimes, however, the bowel is folded in such a way as to prevent the escape of the gas per anum. The only remedy then, if the distension is enormous and unyielding, is in puncturing the bowel by plunging in a small sharp blade, two inches in front of the hip bone, on the right side. The exact point to puncture varies a little with the size and form of the animal. I have seen this fail only once and succeed several times.

When the bowel is impacted with dry feces, and before attempts at purgation would be extremely dangerous. The anti-spasmodics and anodynes may be thus introduced, but proceedings for removing the obstructions must be wholly a posteriori. In some of these cases a patient use of the syringe will be required, with large quantities of warm water often repeated, till the obstructing mass is softened and evacuated. The water must be injected copiously, and when I say copiously, let it be remembered that the large bowel of the horse will hold twelve gallons or more.

THE POTATO BUG.—Now and then I hear of a field taken by the bugs. We are beginning to understand that to get rid of them, they have to be destroyed like vermin. If one begin early to use the remedy, the job is not so great about for several acres. The remedy, and the only one is Paris green one part to twenty or thirty parts of calcined plaster or flour. When the bugs are thick, the plants should be dusted just as soon as they appear above the ground. The first crop of bugs disposed of, there will be little difficulty with the second or third. But if the first crop is allowed to mature the second crop will overwhelm you. If potatoes were properly and suited to the temper of the people, one of the first should be a bug compelling the destruction of the potato bug, the codling moth and the curculio. I have heard of a method of making a dip of [illegible] the leaves in water, then dip the vines. Even after denuded of foliage the potato stems will remain green some days in dry, hot weather, and eight or ten days in cool and wet weather. Then in order to make a crop the vines are completely plowed under and covered up. The vitality in potatoes, both tops, roots and stems, and sometimes a good crop, [illegible] Champaign county (Ill.) Letter to Country Gentleman.
