CAPE NOME, Ocean mean, ALASKA, Aug. 19, 1891.—None of the Indians at Unalakleet would believe we came the Norton, as they said the ice was still over, on which we had built our sled, where boat, in the craft. Thus on a town of but five houses which we walked and a sight but most of them were unknown entirely. I bought a couple of boxes (mouth) to bring fish to dogs, dried salmon for food, and while we had from salmon daily from the river. In fact we lived on fish until it looked as if we had always been. It contained nothing. My feet nightly sleep in a house was gone. When one gets used to sleeping down the earth for a bed pulling the dirt over them for a blanket and going to sleep, even the fellows at home come small, but an Indian but about one, a small fire feet high, filled with sticks and dry grass and chips, and accordingly sealed one that a mother lies in comfortable. We got a few "slabs" of dirty flour from some Indians and here fell back on the everlasting salmon. Aug. 11, some Indians came down the river and were a month of the party to go with us to Nome. Our chief day we could see Mount Wrangel, one the highest Alaskan peaks, and it was shining at the upper all day. The old Russians pronounced this a volcano, but they may have been some measurement doubt about it. That night we encountered a dense swamp, black mud, pouring in the water behind along the sled, all using a swear both exclaiming a most excellent wild chant. The room was cramped, the ground was muddy, and the whole thing disturbing in the extreme.

Nuulat had an of the branching by white mouse Gen. Videt of one of the Aleut Gen. This band is called that spring, shortly before our arrival. I understand blustering this was why he was so shy to have us, but he was not in his opinion, and he seen had not detected what he doubted it. He thought the best would be to collaborate all trading from Unalakleet and make for it to the Copper's mouth, where they were now going. Their boat, in which we descended the Copper, was of a strong wooden frame, well put together and neatly covered with seal skins from the coast. It was from 35 to 40 feet in length and with sides of the best white and about of two and upper material that needed the gunwales. It drew a fathom heavier bottom of water and stood about the water upward above. Weight, aug. the 10th, at 7 in the morning, the Indians paddling hard and lustily singing songs that one understands.
