DROWNED WHILE BATHING.

William Nullinan, a Carpenter, Found Dead in the Big Pool at the Hot Springs.

There was a sad accidental drowning at Beck's Hot Springs on Sunday morning between 6 and 7 o'clock. A number of persons were bathing in the big pool when some one noticed the dry hat there was a dead man at the bottom of the pool. Doorkeeper Gates of Wonderland immediately plunged to the bottom and brought up the body, which was recognized as being that of William Nullinan, a carpenter who lived at the corner of Tenth South and Second West streets. The body was removed to an adjoining building, where Drs. Bowers and Allen made an unsuccessful attempt to resuscitate the unfortunate man.

The body was brought to this city, where Coroner Harris held an inquest yesterday, several witnesses were examined. He was seen by some of them about twenty minutes before his dead body was discovered. It is believed that he had come in contact with the pillars as he dived from the slide and that he was rendered insensible, after which he was strangled.

The jury returned the following verdict: "We find that the deceased came to his death by coming in contact with some hard substance, either floating board or the bottom of the pool, as a result from diving from the platform, or sliding down the toboggan, causing insensibility and strangulation, resulting in death.

"We, the jury, advise further precautions by the Beck's Hot Springs company to prevent the accidents that may occur to those who may not know the danger attending the diving from the high platform and sliding the toboggan."

The deceased was an Odd Fellow, was 35 years of age, and was unmarried. He had lived in Utah about two years, but had no relatives here. It is said that he has a sister in Canada.
