Timely Words to Mothers.

Our Quaker friends in Philadelphia, always foremost with useful practical advice and help, have lately issued a pamphlet addressed to mothers on the subject of the terrible mortality of late years among children during the Summer months, and the means, aside from medical aid, of its prevention and cure. The directions are drawn up by a committee of the Obstetrical Society of Philadelphia, and the names are those of men who stand highest in their profession in the treatment of children. Of course these directions are especially intended for the poorer classes of mothers who are unable to fly with their teething babies out of the foul air of town, or to keep them under the constant oversight of a skilled physician. The rules, like all those most effective in Hygiene, appear to an ordinary reader absurdly simple; yet it is after all disobedience to the simple rules of health and morality, for which, since the days of lamenting Jeremiah to the present time, the people are destroyed. When the Philadelphia doctors urge upon mothers in cities during the summer months, the absolute necessity of bathing the child by immersion in the morning in tepid water and sponging it at night, the rule appears so commonplace an exigency of decency that it is passed over with indifference, just as the Syrian leper scoffed at the prophet's orders to wash himself seven times. "If he had bidden thee do some great thing would'st thou not have done it?" inquired his servant. We have a shrewd suspicion that the simple rules, even in regard to washing, are neither known to nor comprehended by the majority of mothers, or the wise old Quaker doctors would not have issued them thus authoritatively. We therefore make an abstract of them, anxious to do our part in averting the terrible doom of last summer from the little ones.

1. Perfect cleanliness is enjoined in every minute particular; the change of night and day clothing, clean with each change.

2. A bed or cot, apart from its mother, for the child.

3. Plenty of fresh air. The baby should be taken to the Park, the boats that ply up and down the rivers; the shady sides of broad streets or public squares; kept carefully out of the room where cooking or washing is going on, and given plenty of ice water to drink. (But very little at a time).

4. The house kept scrupulously clean. Walls whitewashed; slops and garbage promptly removed; and the air purified by carbolic acid or quicklime.

5. The child, if sick, must be kept to the mother's milk alone, or, if that prove insufficient, to goat's or cow's milk. There is no safe substitute for milk to infants who have not cut their front teeth. No child should be weaned, as a rule, until after its second summer. The food which Nature has provided will often save the life of a child when everything else fails.

6. Without the advice of a physician, no child should be given spirits, cordials, carminatives, or soothing syrups of any kind. Thousands of children, the physicians add, die every year from the use of these poisons.—N. Y. Tribune.

Change of Climate.

Mr. Adams's professional experience has enabled him to put on record valuable details touching the influence of a sub-frigid climate, like that of New Brunswick, upon European settlers at large as well as upon the troops under his medical charge. To the newly arriving from Northern Europe, there is something, he remarks, disappointing in the aspect of the middle-aged of both sexes. Instead of burly, well-nourished farmers in a land where the materials of good living so abound, sallow, weather-beaten countenances, and spare, sinewy frames predominate among men of forty; while the pallid faces of the women indicate often ten years in advance of their real age. Important causes in connection with habits of life, food and climate are here at work. Close stoves, salted provisions, ill-baked bread, even if not aided by alcoholic excess, combine with the natural vicissitudes of extreme and suddenly changing temperature to undermine the stamina of life. The most trying times of the year are the thaws of Spring and the setting in of the cold months, at the rapid transit which passes for Autumn. Consumption and other pulmonary diseases are most fatal at midsummer, after the variable weather. In Winter, pneumonia, the characteristic disease of the climate, is most prevalent.

The deterioration in physique so much remarked upon in the existing settlers is traced by our author in part to the fact, that the first immigrants and reclaimers of the woods were an exceptionally hardy and vigorous race, their successors feeling less demand upon their bodily energies; and in part also to sameness of food and the listlessness induced by extremes of climate. Closeness of intermarriage, especially among the French settlers, has brought about the most frightful of evils. Elephantiasis, or Greek leprosy, has become a settled plague among these poor creatures. In a valuable appendix Mr. Adams furnishes convincing proofs from the records of the lazaretto connecting this shocking malady with the consanguinity of the inmates.—Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper.

BLACKBERRIES.—At a late meeting of the Indiana Horticultural Society, Mr. Ohmer said he had been very successful in growing blackberries. He had been in the business fifteen years, and lost but two crops in ten seasons. Three acres had averaged him $1,000 per year. His rows were eight feet apart and he sets his plants four feet apart in the rows. He planted posts three feet high, at intervals of thirty feet, and from nails in the top of the post he stretched wires from post to post, to which his vines were trained. He plowed once in the spring between the rows and then put in the cultivator or harrow. He did not seek to make large canes, as these do not produce the best crops. He pruned back when the vines are three or four feet high. Allow the old wood to remain among the vines from year to year, as a support to the young vines. The laterals he cut back two feet, or even less, if the vine was delicate. Did not allow them to grow too thick, and no plants were allowed between the rows. The Kittatinny was his favorite, and if he were to plant ten acres he would plant all of that variety. He marketed in half-bushel drawers. Raspberries pay better when sold in quart boxes. His soil was clay with a substratum of gravel. Did not manure at all.

The girls of Springfield (Mass.) factory are supplied by the proprietors with chewing gum, in order that they may not waste time in talking.
