GOVERNOR WELLS'S MESSAGE.

The message of Governor Heber M. Wells, submitted to the Legislature today, is a clear, concise, able document, presenting a valuable and interesting summary of State affairs and making timely recommendations as to needed legislation. In its finances the State is shown to be in much better shape than was thought possible, when the burdens of statehood were assumed, to bring about in such a short time. But so careful has been the administration of public affairs, that the Governor feels safe in advising that the State taxes be reduced twenty per cent below the rate of 1896, or from five mills to four for general State purposes. In regard to appropriations asked for various institutions, the Governor carefully and impartially lays before the legislators the claims and arguments made by the special custodians of such institutions, and where he endorses their request, says so in direct terms; where he conceives that the application is for more funds than the State ought to allow at present, he expresses that view in the kindliest manner possible, yet with a positiveness and clearness that prove him to be well informed upon the details of the matter he is considering. In his recommendations on irrigation, lands, forests, transportation, home industries, and all other topics which the message treats of, his advice is presented in courteous and easily comprehended terms, and is backed by a clearness and force of logic characteristic of an official of superior ability. Upon the various subjects of the message the reports and recommendations submitted to the Governor have been so simplified and succinctly stated by him that it must be a pleasure to the Legislature to receive them in such condensed and comprehensive form. To the general public the entire message will prove interesting and profitable reading; for, although it is a moderately lengthy document, it covers a great range and variety of topics not one of which is treated of in a tiresome manner or with over-elaboration. It is a timely, careful, pleasant address to the whole people through their legislative representatives, and in its statement of facts concerning the State, and its dignified, conservative, and opportune recommendations, it is an extremely valuable State paper.

THE LIGHT SNOWFALL.

Correspondents from different parts of the State express fears for the outcome in agricultural matters next season because of the comparatively small quantity of snow which has fallen this winter. A month ago the prospect was good for a big supply in the mountains from which to draw a bounteous portion of irrigating water in summer. The last days of November brought a goodly quantity of the needful and fastened it in the hills with a cold snap that will keep it there till summer, and it was anticipated that as winter came on there would be still further heavy deposits. But the latter have not materialized, the precipitation of moisture having been abnormally light the past month. From far north in Idaho down to the southern part of this State there has been little addition to the quantity of snow that was on hand in the first part of December; and the present cold, foggy weather does not indicate strongly further acquisition until the season is so far gone that what does come will be so light and warm that it will melt quickly and will aid in dissolving that already on hand, unless the spring should be very cold and backward. At least this is the view expressed by agriculturists in various parts of the State, showing that there is considerable uneasiness because of the existing condition. It is to be hoped, however, that the storms that must come before winter has passed away will relieve this uneasiness. At the same time it is not well to take a too gloomy view of the outlook, since a pretty fair supply of water already is secured, to the extent at least that care in its use and distribution will avert any serious calamity. But the situation which exists and causes doubt in the minds of many ought to be a suggestion to those who are in localities suitable for reservoirs, to avail themselves of this means of storage for seasons when the snowfall is not at a time to hold the waters in the mountains in a frozen state until the heat of summer is upon them.

CALIFORNIA AND UTAH.

The present Utah Legislature, like that of the previous years, seems determined to use its best judgment in keeping expenses and State and county taxes as low as practicable, that the community may obtain relief from oppressive assessments which they have felt in recent years. In pursuance of this policy, the Legislature has decided to get along with as few employes as are necessary to do the work well, and to keep salaries at a low figure. This policy of the Utah solons shines as a bright example of regarding public sentiment and conserving public interests, and presents a marked contrast with the course of the California legislature, if the Bakersfield Californian accurately states the situation there. It says:

> In selecting its horde of useless attaches the Legislature appears to have been governed solely by the desire to provide each member of the majority with a certain amount of "patronage." The needs of the public service are entirely ignored as usual, and the political needs of the legislators are made the paramount consideration. The list of employes includes any number of gate-keepers, assistant gatekeepers, pages and guards, clerks and all manner of highly paid attaches who have nothing under the sun to do except to kill time and draw their salaries of $5 to $8 a day, whereas they could not earn more than $2 a day on their merits.

SPENCER'S LIFE WORK.

Mr. Herbert Spencer has completed the work of his life by finishing the tenth volume of his Synthetic Philosophy. It has taken him about thirty-six years to forge the chain of thought now complete, and perhaps the most remarkable feature of it is that the foundation of his philosophy, laid a generation ago, is in perfect harmony with the superstructure reared in later years. Whatever may be thought of Mr. Spencer's views, he will be accorded a prominent place among the thinkers of this century, and his work will be of immeasurable benefit to students of the great questions which he has endeavored to answer.

In a review of the work in the Chicago Times-Herald it is noted that the new volume—the third of the Appleton's edition—deals extensively with Industrial Institutions. The reviewer says:

> The new part and the longest third, which makes really more than one-half of the new volume—"Industrial Institutions"—leads to the conclusion that industry regulates itself by necessity and convenience, or would do so if there were no coercion such as governmental interference supplies. That in the near future, as the pendulum swings, at first socialism, the reactionary influence seized upon by those who cannot wait for evolution to do her perfect work, will probably prevail, while in the final swing into place, although he is dubious and dispassionate as to this, and the enthusiasms of youth have died within him, the "universal rhythm of evolution" will bring individualism into true balance. About the absurdities and inadequacies of socialism, however, Mr. Spencer is neither dubious nor dispassionate; he depicts the situation in Germany as an instance of its failure in terms of no uncertainty. And although accounting for the German's readiness to embrace bureaucracy, to which their state socialism is equivalent, by the fact of their having changed so lately from feudalism, he defines their status as "an approach to an ordinary militant type of structure shown in the growing subcrate power of the middle-empire, who is swayed by the absolutely pagan thought of responsibility to ancestors in heaven."
>
> Mr. Spencer depends upon what he calls the "recompleasing" of some of his early statements for force in the new connection. His argument as to the importation of the law of the family into society (contained in his "Domestic Institutions") and the doom of society in consequence, he repeats in part verbatim from the earlier work. The law of the family is "that during immature life benefit received must be in proportion as worth is small, while during mature life benefit and worth must vary together." He then quotes from his own argument: "Clearly, with a society, as with a species, survival depends upon conformity to both of these antagonistic principles. Import into the family the law of society, and let children from infancy upward have life-sustaining supplies proportioned to their life-sustaining labors, and the society disappears forthwith by death of all its young. Import into society the law of the family, and let the life-sustaining supplies be great in proportion as the life-sustaining labors are small, and the society decays from increase of its least worthy members. Now, more or less fully, the doctrine of collectivists, socialists and communists ignores this distinction between the ethics of family life and the ethics of life outside the family. Entirely, under some forms, and in chief measure under others, it proposes to extend the regime of the family to the whole community."
>
> Notwithstanding [illegible] Mr. Spencer perhaps begs a premise or so in some of his arguments. Supposing "the same general moral nature in all," under the evil influence of a socialistic state of society, Mr. Spencer asks: "What is to be the mental attitude of the less able when perpetually receiving doles from the more able? We are obliged to assume such feeling in each as would prompt him to sustain unpaid efforts on behalf of his fellows, and yet such lack of this feeling as would conduce to let his fellows sub themselves for his benefit. The currency of all is to be so noble that it causes continuous sacrifice of self to others, and so ignoble that it continuously lets others sacrifice to self. These traits are contradictory. The implied constitution is an impossible one."

The philosopher's view of slavery will startle many. He considers that condition inevitable in one form or another. The "freedom" enjoyed by the factory worker, he argues, amounts to little more than the ability to exchange one slavery for another. We are coerced by circumstances now, instead of by one master. Coercion remains in one or another shape, and in the case of the factory worker, we have retrogressed, and not even stood still.

In a chapter upon the future of man, the aged philosopher prophesies that communism must win, that the "type of self-ownership into ownership by the community must occur." He predicts "a gradual metamorphosis, rather than a sudden change of regime." "If year after year more things are done by public and less by private agency, then in no long time the present voluntary industrial organization will have its place entirely usurped by a compulsory industrial organization. And so will be established a state in which no man can do what he likes, but everybody does as he is told. * * * An entire loss of freedom will thus be the fate of those who do not deserve the freedom they possess."

After this immediate future, however, comes a remote future, and the author thinks that a sudden burst of intolerable bonds may bring on, once more, military despotism. Primitive extinction may follow gradual decay. The ultimate result, however, will be a man in perfect harmony with his surroundings. This is the philosopher's closing words, an echo—though weak—of the voice of the inspiration that has sounded through the ages:

> Long studies * * * have not caused me to recede from the belief expressed nearly fifty years ago that the ultimate man will be one whose private requirements coincide with public ones. He will be that manner of man, who, in spontaneously fulfilling his own nature, incidentally performs the functions of a social unit, and yet is only enabled to fulfil his own nature by all others doing the like.

PRAYER IN THE LEGISLATURE.

The manner in which the office and duty of chaplain have been spoken of by members of the Legislature, both in caucus and open session, has been calculated to expose to ridicule that which most of the people of our State regard as sacred. The great majority of the inhabitants of Utah are pre-eminently a religious community, and it grates harshly on their feelings to hear the subject of prayer spoken of contemptuously or even lightly.

When men are engaged in the discharge of labors or duties to which attaches great responsibility or solemnity, an appeal to the Deity for aid, light and guidance, offered by themselves, or by a mouthpiece speaking in their presence and behalf, has a good effect. It tends to compose the mind, to calm and clear the judgment, to promote harmony and unity, and to increase faith in the beneficence of the Creator. A man who is religious or reverential in his nature has a desire for such a spiritual exercise, and derives help, comfort and courage from it; while a man who is neither religious nor reverential cannot easily be injured by listening to a prayer.

For these and other reasons it is quite consistent and appropriate that the daily sessions of a legislative body should be opened with prayer. But if the prevailing sentiment among the members of the body is one of contempt or even disrespect towards the chaplain and his sacred function, it were better to abolish his office. Better that there should be no public prayers in a legislative body, than that they should be made the subject of coarse jokes or irreverent comment.

IMPARTIALITY OF COURTS.

When there are instances in this country of a failure to administer the criminal law with equal application to all classes—and unfortunately there are too many of that kind—it is not unusual to point out instances of an opposite class in England, and to conclude therefore, that the British administration of criminal law is superior to that in vogue in this country. However that may be if the whole ground were considered, it is not safe to decide that there are no judges in this country who seek to apply the law impartially, or no judges in England who do not make as notable departures from the equitable rule as can be found in this country. In England this may be seen as between classes, the arbitrary g[iv]ing such favors as are dispensed, while in this country the distinction is mainly between the sexes, the women generally being let off as if they were creatures irresponsible for the crimes they commit wilfully. For illustration of this may be noted the sentencing on the same day, in an English court, of a man who beat his wife to death to one year's imprisonment, while a woman of a lower class of society was given twelve years in jail for passing a counterfeit half-crown; and as a parallel to the condemning of Lady Scott to eight months for libel, cited as evidence that the English law is thorough-going, is the case of Scheyer, sentenced in Los Angeles last week. Scheyer was a man of influence in political circles, and when he was convicted of selling diseased beef contrary to law, it was believed that his political "pull" would save him. But the judge insisted that the enforcement of the law without fear, favor or delay was his duty, and he gave Scheyer the full penalty for his offense—six months in the county jail. It is quite possible that if the libeler in England had been in a lower class of society the sentence would have been heavier, and if Scheyer had been a woman she would have got off easy.

EVERYBODY IN UTAH TO READ THIS

WHERE IS THERE A MORE BEAUTIFUL or more healthful city in the world than Salt Lake? Where is there another city of its size that so large a proportion of all tourists crossing the American continent stop to visit? Go to any mining camp in Nevada, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming or Colorado and ask the miner and the mining man where they expect to live when they make a stake, and almost invariably they will tell you in Zion; or go to any city in the East, let the people know you are from Utah and a large per cent of them will say, "I have always had a desire to go to Salt Lake City to live." Now is it not reasonable to presume, with every one speaking its praise, that this city is destined to have a steady, healthy growth and become a great city. At Utah's one thousand and one attractions which is the greatest? Would not the verdict of ninety-nine persons out of every hundred be the Great Salt Lake and the bathing facilities, with the finest bathing in the world, visited by from twenty to twenty-five thousand people in a day. It is not extravagant to say there will be built here, in the near future, hotels, restaurants, homes, apartments, cottages and parks, with shade trees, lawns, fountains, drive ways, etc., where families will go during the hot months to enjoy a cool breeze from the Lake. When you consider that Saltair Cottage City at Saltair Beach is on the main line of the Salt Lake & Los Angeles railroad, which will be a direct line to the Pacific coast, you must realize the value of ground at this point. Saltair Cottage City begins at a point near the Lake and extends along the railway towards Salt Lake City, giving a frontage of one and one quarter miles along the track.
