WHAT IS TO BE DONE?

The thugs, thieves and scoundrels of high and low degree who make of this city their Paradise have got well-nigh to the point of impudence enjoyed by the late William M. Tweed when he asked, "Well, what are you going to do about it?" If we had any reasonable ground for hope that the parallel thus established might proceed until the same answer is returned here that was in New York to the Tammany chieftain, we might endure the nightly outrages with greater equanimity, feeling assured that each succeeding one only hastened the happy denouement; but this does not seem likely. We are decidedly "in for it," the law is powerless, the constabulary invisible except when on dress parade, the majority of our residents will not carry arms and but few would use them if they did, and that is where we find ourselves.

Undoubtedly each unpunished act does but embolden the gentry of patched feet and skeleton key proclivities; not only this, but it encourages others at a distance to come along and take a hand, while having a tendency to overcome the scruples of the most thoughtful and backward among the lawless. The spectacle of a man being made to stand and deliver within a stone's throw of his own residence and with people actually passing while the robbery proceeds, is one that has the effect of placing our city in a light most lovely and enviable to the professional highwayman or cracksman; it could scarcely be surpassed even in Chicago; and when we say that it alone places us in the front rank of modern cities so far as the specialty spoken of is concerned, we do so more in sorrow than in anger and without even a trace of pride.

Things human that are radically and rankly wrong most find a quietus sooner or later. The end never comes of itself as in the case of most other things, because, as shown, the less it is disturbed the more it flourishes. After passing the point up to which forbearance is the rule, the sequel is always a dark and unwelcome chapter in the history of any community, but it has the justification to rely on that it has become a choice between such record and a worse one; and afterwards comes the long hoped-for condition of unarmed protection and security without ceaseless vigilance.

Something must be done and that quickly. Our streets must not be surrendered to thieves and cut-throats from the going down of the sun to the rising thereof, with a period of undisturbed repose for them between times, and our residences converted into arsenals barred and guarded as if we had returned to barbaric days. Not a single citizen whose bent of mind is peaceful and whose department is quiet and orderly, be compelled to arm themselves from head to foot and be constantly on guard wherever they may go. They are entitled to a better condition of things than this, and we reiterate that by one means or another they will have it. Men who on general principles are opposed to war or the settlement of any question by strife and disorder, very often are loudest in their demand for bloodshed and carnage because matters have passed the point of tolerance and peaceful methods are shown to be fruitless. If we have not reached that condition yet, we are uncomfortably close to it with every prospect of the remaining ground being covered without much delay. A beginning suggested by some is to offer a large reward to the first man who kills a robber or burglar in the act, and a larger reward for capturing him alive and turning him over to a committee of citizens appointed to receive him. This is awful, we know; the mere suggestion will create an involuntary shudder with many. The majority would doubtless, with law-abiding tendencies and a hope which is not bedimmed through the violent shock of a personal experience, be set against it. Wendell Phillips would have opposed it two days ago, but what would likely be his reply if questioned regarding it now? The rest of us do not want his experience and should it be thrust upon us.

THE CHANNEL TUNNEL.

It is hard for Americans to understand British opposition to the proposed tunnel under the English channel on the ground that the insular strength heretofore given by the "surrounding silver thread of sea" would be by it undermined and destroyed. Yet that is precisely the argument used against the scheme, urged, too, by the nation's military leaders and some of the most eminent statesmen. England's invincibility at home, say they, has been because of her isolated position; what would be thought of a government that would countenance the practical destruction of the watery frontier, the veritable preparation of a highway, or rather low-way, by which an invader could reach the sacred shores dry-shod?

Frequent repetition of these silly stock phrases have not seemed to strengthen their value with those who clamored for the tunnel, nor has the ridicule heaped upon them seemed to impair their value with those in high quarters who opposed it. At one time, indeed, the question threatened to become an absolute test of patriotism; and those parties were looked at askance who scouted the idea that an army of sufficient dimensions to capture the island could by any possibility be enabled to emerge from the English end of the tunnel, and who in a time of irony suggested as an extra precaution that a series of plugs could be so arranged that in case of real attempt at invasion the jealous sea could be let in to drown the enemy into the rats in a trap.

Perhaps the chief sanction of the project has been due to the various society of the French [illegible] through. As a page of the daily the potent spirit which Thackeray called "the Corsican upstart" the project of tunneling under or bridging over the Straits of Dover was discussed among the agencies for changing the map of Europe. If Napoleon had any purpose in his various ideas of vast engineering it was conquest, and that only; and many there are in the English nation today who see in each successive revival of this colossal project nothing but a renewal of the threats in which he was wont to indulge. Hence the feeling that there is some dark design of invasion, if not by France by some other nation who by conquest of France or purchase of the privilege might secure a right of way into the continental end of the tunnel; and hence the appalling notion that it would have such connection with the mainland would be to leave the British back door wide open.

The subject excites comment just now because it is understood that Gladstone is favorable to it. The world will watch with interest the storm that is to open a vocancy of it will awaken, and will await with unused patience the outcome of the negotiations when once begun.

HONOR TO "BILL" CLAWSON.

Information comes from Paris that the talents of Mr. J. W. Clawson of this city, who is now studying the art of painting at the French capital, have received very gratifying recognition. His friends will rejoice to learn that one of the products of his facile brush has been accepted by the proper authorities for exhibition at the World's Fair at Chicago. The painting is from a study made while Mr. Clawson was in Venice, and is 8½ by 4½ feet in size. There were four hundred and fifty competitors, all American students in France. The works of one hundred and fifty of these were accepted, and among them that of our talented townsman. He is to be sincerely congratulated.

It has often been noticed with pleasure and gratitude in the heart of every friend of Utah, that her students abroad almost invariably are found in the front rank, no matter what the study or profession in which they engage. The present is another conspicuous corroboration of it; and a natural inference would seem to be that as these instances multiply year by year, the attention of the world at large must at last be drawn to the fact that Utah is as wealthy in skill and intelligence as in natural resources.

DIVIDING ELECTORAL FAVORS.

The late Presidential election was in many respects a record breaker. Five states divided their votes—California, Michigan, North Dakota, Ohio and Oregon; Cleveland got all but one in the first named; five out of fourteen in the second, one in the third, one in the fourth, and Weaver took one from Harrison in Oregon. It was reserved for North Dakota, however, to fairly outstrip all precedents and set the country an example of impartiality never even thought of before; she has three votes in the college and gave each of the candidates named one, thus making her favors go around as far as possible. If she had had one more, doubtless it would have been cast for the Prohibition candidates, Bidwell and Fisk. Considering that it is North Dakota's first experience in voting for a President, she has done very well indeed; but her political status is about as uncertain a quantity as could well be imagined.

THE CONNECTICUT PLAN.

Utah is not the only commonwealth whose political experience has supplied the world with new conditions and strange precedents. The state of Connecticut, from the days of the blue laws down to the present time, has occasionally engaged in a performance embracing all the phases of a modern melodrama, being inconsistent, nonsensical, unusual, peculiar, novel, strange, startling, humorous and pathetic. The legislature which recently adjourned sine die has to its credit—if that is the proper word—the feat of having set out a full term without passing a single act or doing anything whatever except sit-sat, dilly-dally and defeat all proposed legislation. At the late election the man who was elected governor of the Nutmeg state—Morris—was chosen by a decided majority, and is now administering the functions of his office. He was elected two years before, but was kept out of the place until his recent inauguration through the political maneuvers resorted to. During all that time one Bulkeley has been holding the office, and the strangest part of the whole story is that he was never elected nor yet a candidate for the place! He had held the position of lieutenant governor and entered into the higher office upon the death of the incumbent. At the election following, another Republican had been nominated for governor and Morris by the Democrats; the latter got very many more votes than the former, but it was not an absolute majority, and thus the choice was thrown into the legislature, which has been wrangling and doing nothing ever since, whereby Bulkeley has been holding over and enjoying the perks and emoluments of an office which, as stated, he was neither elected to nor a candidate for. At the late election, the people, who had previously expressed their desire in the premises with exceedingly sufficient emphasis, decided to add more votes to their thousands in order to convince, and to give Governor Morris an opportunity over any where in the same time shooting a line, or an hundred-line. He now resumes or announces to the c[illegible] on regarding election, changing existing conditions so that a plurality as well as a majority shall elect, as is the rule in every state in the Union outside of New England and not unanimously there in three. The suggestion is echoed by the independent press almost without exception, and there are fair prospects that the agitation will at last result in the adoption of the amendment asked for.

CONCERNING MRS. LEASE.

Those who have sought to make light of the political aspirations of Mrs. Lease and to ridicule her candidacy for the United States senatorship in Kansas, in most instances have been reckoning without their host. The Springfield (Mass.) Republican has taken the trouble to ascertain as to her antecedents and general status, and informs the waiting world that she is not Mary Ann Lease, nor Mary Ellen Lease, but Mary Elizabeth Lease, and she has both Irish and Scotch blood in her veins. Her father, her brothers and her uncle died in the Federal service during the civil war, and her own life has been a struggle with the world ever since her father's death at Andersonville. Besides having a command of the English language, she knows French as well as Greek and Latin, and she is equally at home in discussing general political questions, woman suffrage, temperance, the labor question, socialism and religion. She is something of a poet likewise, and she recalls that when she was scarcely 10 years old she had a war poem published in the Boston Post. Now, let any one who entertains objections, or knows of others who have any, to the lady's becoming a solon in the upper establishment of the national law-making body, present the same at once or forever after hold his peace.

CONTINUING THE SUBJECT of Columbian stamps alluded to yesterday, the New York Sun, just to hand, reminds us that for forty years the highest stamp issued by the government was a 90-cent denomination. Foreign governments have issued stamps of high denominations in the interest of collectors, but this is the first issue on the part of this country. The price, which is something over $15 for the entire set, is regarded as rather exorbitant. But, on the part of the government, it has been a lucky enterprise. Before a stamp had left the press there were orders amounting to $250,000 from stamp collectors abroad to be filled. It will interest small people to know that among those who one from Wilhelmina, the little queen of Holland, who is an ardent stamp collector.

A COLONY of Mormons is going to settle in Mexico. We should be glad to have them all colonize there.—Boston Transcript.

Should you, really? Then you are a stupid ignoramus as to the benefits accomplished by the Mormons in the Rocky and best part of the United States territory; you are miserably unpatriotic in desiring this nation to lose a quarter of a million of its thriftiest, most orderly and most honest citizens; and you are as infamously bigoted as was that royal pedant King James, who hated and harried the Puritans till they left England for Holland and later left Holland for Plymouth Rock. You are a nice Christian, are you not! But rest your narrow soul in peace. The Mormons will not, even to please you, all go to Mexico and colonize there.

A CONTRARY-MINDED and willfully obtuse contemporary which has devoted many a column to petty sneers against and strained disquisitions upon the President's proclamation of amnesty, finding itself at last driven from every single point, assumes a ludicrous air of innocence and asks some one to define for it the difference between irresolute and irresolutum. What it needs much more than this—and from a truth-loving public the need is likely to be supplied—is a stern warning as to the difference between foolish obstinacy and honest conviction, even if the latter has to be coupled with a confession of error.

In putting the qualifications of Hon. H. M. Williams for the honor of carrying Missouri's electoral vote to Washington, an elopsed party organ says "he is an old Democratic warhorse with his collar marks on his shoulders, the hair rubbed off his sides where traces rubbed him and no marks of scars where he was clipped by axes or horses against the tree coming."
