THAT REGISTRATION BUSINESS.

We believe that County Commissioners Roberts and Christophersen did an injustice to some of the people of Salt Lake county in voting down the resolution of Commissioner Geddes to reopen registration on the 29th and 30th of the present month, so that those who had been missed could be given an opportunity to register, and that registry agents could have full opportunity to close up their work. The plea of economy on the part of the two commissioners named was not good in this instance; expenses less urgent for the public good have been passed upon favorably. Commissioner Geddes's proposition was in the right line, and should have prevailed.

With respect to the limitation of the registration to ten days in Salt Lake county, probably the commissioners would act differently if they had it to do over again. This being the first registration under State laws, the longest scope of time possible should have been allowed. It was a commendable effort to make the canvass as inexpensive as possible to the county; but the law allows twenty days—from the 10th to the 30th of September. The commissioners cut it down to ten days. If the period had been from the 10th to the 20th, instead of five days later, it would have been much better than from the 15th to the 25th, and would have allowed several days at the close to reopen, if necessary.

The house to house canvass idea is a most excellent one in the present state of affairs here. Were it not for that, thousands of those who registered when called upon at their homes by the agents would have failed to go to an office to do so, and the house to house canvass should be maintained in the law for some years at least. With respect to the open offices of registry agents, which is on Tuesday and Saturday of the week beginning with the second Monday in October, and which in the present year falls on October 13th and 17th, there is still an opportunity for those who have not registered to do so. The only complaint that can be made of the law in this respect is that two days was too little, and a week would have been better for the first registration. The small election precincts, however, may make two, or at most three, days enough in the future. The law as it stands is fortunate in at least one respect, viz., that it contains both the house to house and open office provisions, so that really no one who wants to be registered can blame any one else but himself for failure to do so.

THE R. G. W. MARSHALS.

Today, Tuesday, the Rio Grande Western railway is again in condition for uninterrupted through traffic. For the first time for several days, the express train leaves this city with the anticipation of going clear through to the eastern terminus of the line, without delay or change. The series of washouts between Crescent and Ruby stations, in Grand county, has been repaired, and the railway company is no longer under the necessity of transferring passengers, mail and baggage from one train to another, over breaks in the line. The financial loss to the company by the recent unusually severe storms which passed over southeastern Utah must have been very heavy, and the inconvenience occasioned at the damaged points, remote from settled localities, and in a wild, rough part of the country, has been very great.

With all the seriousness of the washouts, however, in their effect on the operation of the road, the patrons of the railway have been put to a surprisingly slight inconvenience; the delay to passenger traffic has been comparatively insignificant; and the discomfort to those who have had occasion to go over that route has been practically nil. It is true there has been quite a burden on the railway men, from the superintendent down, in bridging over the temporary difficulties and in putting the line into repair so speedily after such a visitation; but the labor was undertaken and performed with a willingness and efficiency that are highly commendable. This occasion is a marked illustration of good and quick work that can be accomplished by a well organized and competent operating department. It was to be expected that the railway would lose no time in getting into first class shape on this occasion, as it has done on others when the line has been damaged; but the special facility with which this purpose was effected under such circumstances as have prevailed recently where the breaks occurred, is a high compliment to the Rio Grande Western's management, and cannot fail to favorably impress the public as to the capability and enterprise of those who control the workings of the road.

THE ALBATROSS.

The latest invention in flying machines is that of Mr. William Paul, a Russian by birth, now living in Chicago. He calls his air ship the Albatross and confidently expects great results from it.

According to the description the Albatross is a boat frame nineteen feet long and six feet wide, covered with sileoth. Above this are three balance tunnels, the central one being left open at the top while the two side spaces are roofed. Above this are the wings, seven feet wide and forty feet in length from tip to tip. Above the wings is an adjustable plane supposed to balance the machine and back of the body is a tail and also a rudder.

The inventor is now waiting for a favorable wind to lift him up into the air. Two preliminary experiments he considers entirely satisfactory. One proved that he had complete control over the equilibrium of the machine. The other demonstrated, it is thought, that it could be steadied in its flight and come down as gently as the bird whose name it bears, and the inventor, therefore, feels confident that when he gets a good start, he will be able to sail up in the air and alight somewhere in Michigan.

The construction of the Albatross is the result of a change of opinion among aerial navigators, according to which the basis of experiments must be shifted from the principle of the balloon to that of the bird. Mr. Paul having been a close observer of the albatross came to the conclusion that the bird obtains its soaring and speed powers through the peculiar shape of its wings and its method of balancing the body. The problem now was to construct a machine in imitation of the albatross.

When Mr. Paul came to Chicago, eighteen years ago, he began to put his ideas into practical form by building small models and flying them as kites. Then, in 1889, he went to Mammoth Cave, Ky., and built his first albatross machine on a large scale. It was intended to carry one man—himself—weighing 150 pounds. With this machine he experimented two years, and on one occasion, at Eden's pond, near Mammoth Cave, soared in the air for three quarters of an hour. He says he could stay up in the air for an indefinite time under the same conditions. Mr. Paul states that one day when the wind was pretty high his "albatross" machine lifted nine men from the ground and almost carried them up into the sky. Three of the men were newspaper reporters.

The present model cost for construction the sum of $400, and it is nothing but a soaring machine. It is the plan, when all the details have been perfected and its success established, to build a much larger machine, capable of carrying five or six passengers and equip it with a motor and propeller.

The various attempts at solving the problem of soaring through the air instead of crawling along the surface of the earth cannot but be viewed with the greatest interest, for the accomplishment of that feat will have an immense influence on the further development of human society in all its ramifications. Its significance is hardly less than that which was attached to man's first effort at crossing a stream on a floating log, from which proceeds the whole modern science of navigation has sprung. One effect may be the bringing together in closer fellowship the nations of the earth and consequently the hastening of that era of brotherhood and peace for which mankind is longing. Speaking of this subject one of Mr. Paul's friends and supporters writes:

I am glad to believe that when man succeeds in flying through the air the ultimate effect will be to diminish greatly the frequency of wars and to substitute some more rational methods of settling international misunderstandings. This may come to pass not only because of the additional horrors which will result in battle, but because no part of the field will be safe, no matter how distant from the actual scene of conflict. The effect must be to introduce great uncertainty as to the result of maneuvers or of superior forces by the removal of that comparative immunity from danger which is necessary to enable the commanding officers to carry out their plans, for a single explosive dropped from a flying machine may destroy the chiefs, disorganize the plans and bring confusion to the stronger or more skillfully led side. This uncertainty as to results must render nations and authorities still more unwilling to enter into contests than they are now, and perhaps in time make wars of extremely rare occurrence.

A HERO IN THE RANKS.

The action of Charles Wilkins, a locomotive fireman in the employ of the Northern Railway of New Jersey, on Saturday morning last, deserves a place in history to indicate to future generations the heroism which finds frequent expression in deeds in this age, and which should prove an incentive to others to like acts of unselfish courage. Four tracks lie side by side at the western approach to the Bergen tunnel, near Jersey City. The train on which Wilkins was came around a curve just west of the tunnel's mouth at the rate of about twenty miles an hour. As soon as the engine was on the straight track Wilkins, glancing ahead, saw a woman in the track of his own engine, and as he watched her she stepped hurriedly over to the Erie rails, where she stood, apparently waiting for his train to pass. As Wilkins's train was borne down on her an Erie passenger train shot out of the tunnel behind her at the rate of thirty miles an hour. The roar of both trains was in her ears and she was paralyzed with fear. In a few seconds the Erie train would be upon her, though the Northern would reach the point first. Wilkins grasped the situation at once. "Slow down; I'll jump for her," said he to the engineer. It was a desperate risk of his own life. Brakes were applied, and when his engine was about thirty feet from the woman, Wilkins jumped. The Erie train was within sixty yards, and a slip meant death under the ponderous wheels; but the fireman did not slip. The woman saw him, but terror held her there. She screamed when he seized her, as if his touch had given her voice. She was no light-weight, but Wilkins raised her in his arms and leaped to the strip of sand beside the track. Her feet had scarcely cleared the rails when the express thundered by, the wind of it covering the woman and her rescuer with dust. Wilkins did not stop to ask why she was there or what her name was. He saw that she was uninjured, and however frightened, did not appear to be one of the fainting kind, so he ran away from her shrieks, crossed the Erie track again, and as his own train, the speed of which had been reduced, went by, he swung himself aboard the rear car. Three hundred passengers were on the Northern train, many of whom had seen the act, their attention being attracted by the slowing down; they knew that a misstep meant widowhood for Mrs. Wilkins and sorrow for five young children in the town of Nyack, where the fireman's home was; and the knowledge of the danger that had been passed through in saving the woman's life brought hearty cheers and congratulations for the brave fireman. His courage is of that high order that is inspired by that greater love which seeks its reward in the salvation of a fellow being, and which receives its full recompense from a source higher than all mortal conditions.

The San Francisco Chronicle thinks the inflow of gold to this country at present is due to the fact that foreign capitalists believe that McKinley's election is assured and that things are soon going to boom in the United States. Whether that conjecture is true or not, it is tolerably certain that some other explanation of the turn of the gold tide is needed than the statement that we now have a favorable trade balance.
