DUCKS.

Importance of Some One Who Realized a Handsome Profit.

Five years ago, says a writer in The Rural New Yorker, I hatched out 65 common ducks, and having limited that ducks would eat their heads off I kept an account of everything they ate. I take the amount of feed and the prices paid from my book of that year. I lost 11 ducklings, so I had 54 to market. Within a fortnight some eight or twelve weeks old. In their 12 weeks of active life they consumed the following: 895 pounds of cornmeal and bran, equal quantities of each by measure, at 90 cents per 100 pound, $8.05; 60 loaves of stale bread, 60 cents, and 75 pounds of ground beef scrap, at 2 cents, $1.50, making $10.24 the total cost of the food consumed.

I sold the 54 ducks, which weighed 236 pounds, for 13 cents per pound to a local poultry shipper, or $30.68, a net profit of $19.14 over the cost of food, or an average of about 35 cents per duck, which shows that all ducks do not eat their heads off.

PEKIN DUCKS.

This experiment gave me the duck fever, and I thought if common mud ducks would pay a net profit of 35 cents per head some good large thoroughbreds would do better. So though late in the season I at once sent to James Rankin for a lot of eggs from his Imperial Pekins. In due time I had 64 bright young ducklings hatched and by extra care raised 63 of them. They certainly were beauties, and some of them weighed seven pounds each alive at 10 weeks old. I have been raising several hundred each year since and have received a net profit above cost of feed of from 40 to 60 cents each, always killing them in the summer when about 8 to 11 weeks old.

If properly fed and cared for, a Pekin duck will vary nearly get its weight at 10 weeks of age. For quick growth they should be kept in yards and fed five times a day for the first few weeks, then three times a day until marketed, with plenty of water to drink and grit for digesting their food.

How Water Gets Into Tiles.

There is no need of leaving openings between tile joints for water to get into them. They are not made like sewer pipe, each one fitting into the enlarged end of the tile below it. Draintiles are always laid end to end, and, however carefully it is done, the joints will never closely fit against each other. Besides, most tile is made in horseshoe fashion and the edges set on the bottom of the drain, the water usually rising up in springs under them. Thus, except after the surface has been flooded by water from thawed snow which could not sink through the strata of ice under it, very little water ever runs into tile from the top. The tendency always is for water to sink down into the water courses at or below the level of the tile bottom and to be forced into the tile from the bottom. This is done through natural water veins, and the water thus comes through the soil without a particle of sediment. This can be seen by the digger of the drain. The water under his feet will be muddied by his tramping in it, but let him leave the ditch for dinner, and when he returns all the sediment will have disappeared and the stream be running with perfectly clear water. This is the way it always runs in the tile after the ditch is laid. The only exception, says American Agriculturist, is where surface water breaks into a drain when newly laid. The drain will need looking after for two or three years, and such places must be closed as quickly as possible, for the water flowing in the tile from above will carry sediment and some else is, especially if there is an uneven fall in some part of the drain.

In Colorado they plant potatoes on alfalfa ground with excellent results.
