CONSTRUCTION OF SILOS.

Opinions Expressed in a Bulletin from the Wisconsin Station.

The points here given are based upon the extensive investigation of Mr. F. H. King, of the Wisconsin station, who examined ninety-three silos. As a result of his observation and experience, Mr. King believes that the silo should not be less than twenty-four feet deep and either round or as nearly square as practicable, because "these forms give the greatest capacity with the least amount of side exposure." In the construction of silos careful attention should be paid to the area of surface exposed in feeding the silage.

Agricultural Notes.

The efforts of the agricultural department to introduce Indian corn in Europe as an article of food are meeting with considerable success, especially in Germany.

The largest sailing vessel in the world was launched not long since, and she was not launched in America, either, but in Scotland, at Glasgow, and she was built for a firm of German merchants at Bremen, being designed for the East India trade. She is named the Maria Rickmers.
