REPORTING TRIALS.

POSITIONS THAT DEMAND THE BEST SHORTHAND WRITERS.

To Do Good Work the Stenographer Must Know Something of the Case In Advance—Grave Responsibilities That Accompany the Employment.

There are thousands of shorthand writers, but of first class, gilt-edged stenographers who can go into court and report a trial with accuracy and a thorough understanding of the situation the number will not exceed a score. Only of these is a woman who is thoroughly competent.

As a musician who aspires to be called such should be able to read at sight and play any music that may be set before him, so the first class stenographer should be able to capable of following literally the speech of the most rapid talker and to use his notes afterward as readily as he could read the letters on a signboard. In court work there is much that makes for success in a technical nature. The law terms, the peculiar phraseology of the courts, is something which it takes years for men to familiarize themselves with, and a great many of the lawyers are men who pour out a perfect torrent of words in their arguments in the court or jury.

The first thing that a stenographer must do when he starts in to report a case is to get the theory of both sides as to the case. Often one stenographer is employed to take the case for both sides, and he must familiarize himself with the case from the different standpoints in order to report the case in such a way that it will be properly understood by that is required. There must be quickness of apprehension to a marked degree and an intelligence not been at every point in the case from its inception.

In taking down what goes on there is considerable that should be omitted from the proceedings, and this is where the stenographer's judgment comes into play. The lawyers do not wish to have the record burdened up with the little side remarks of witnesses or interpolations of the court, and yet they do not want anything omitted in which a possible objection could hang.

A judge may make a remark which does not bear any particular significance in a trial, and a witness is apt to follow up an answer by a subsequent qualification which may have much to do with the matter in hand. The wary stenographer and the good one separates the wheat from the chaff, and what is relevant and important he sets down. What is immaterial is ignored. Of course in the evidence he takes the questions and answers literally. And in the charge of the testimony he must always be on the alert, for here the lawyers may get into a dispute as to what a witness said in regard to some other point in the testimony, and it may be necessary to go back several pages to find out the truth of the matter. This the stenographer must be able to do without the slightest hesitation, remembering just about in the testimony where the matter came up and reading the notes without the slightest hesitation or inaccuracy. Possessing faculties of a high order are necessary to the success of a stenographer and a quick brain and excellent memory.

Given the intelligence and aspiration to begin with, and it is possible for a man to become a fairly good shorthand writer in five or six years. Constant practice is necessary to keep in trim for court work, and in spite of the fact that so much legal business is done the demand for experts is always in excess of the supply.

The stenographer's work is to be coupled with not only a sense of great responsibility, but a very high degree of confidence of it is very placed in him by the men who employ his services. The tripping of one's tongue or pen may mean much, perhaps, but the ground for argument and the true status of the case is concerned, on the stenographic results. It is one of the professions where the hand and the brain combine to produce results, and the first class expert is more truly born than made.

It is one thing to be able to write down the report of a trial and quite another thing to dictate correctly from the stenographic notes to a typewriter. Some men are only fair at the latter, yet get out excellent transcripts of the evidence, while others are "chain lightning" at the trial, but unreliable when they get back to their offices and commence to make copy. The one hardened expert will take a trial, put away the report for six weeks and then take the shorthand books and read off the contents without a hook as fast as a typewriting operative can drum it off on the machine.

A great deal of work is done at night by the shorthand men. So much of what is taken down at a trial on one day is needed on the succeeding day that the lawyers generally keep up with the evidence as it is brought out, and this keeps the shorthand people on the move. Work in the courts is done at a high tension of the nerves and brain, and not an instant is the stenographer's mind permitted to idle. In day lessons, for any form of mental "woolgathering" would be fatal to careful work. Concentration is an indispensable requisite to success.—Chicago Chronicle.

Monkeys That Wear Shawls.

In certain districts in east Africa, especially in the forest of Kilimanjaro, there is a race of monkeys which have actually developed the wearing of shawls.

They do not wind them, however, and wear them through having seen men do this. On the contrary, these shawls are the product of nature and are merely another manifestation of the law that animals develop certain peculiarities in accordance with their need to become less conspicuous to the forests or places in which they live.

These monkeys belong to a group of long-tailed monkeys, which are to be found in Africa and are called by the native Guenons. They have a black ball, frame which depends a beautiful white break, with the whole of the hair of the back of the animal, which is long and silky and white, hangs over the sides of the body and over the front and hind legs as well, thus giving it the perfect appearance of wearing a shawl.—Strand Magazine.

Didn't Like the Saw Edges.

When the government issued the first postage stamps a few of the good folk living in the country were so bound by conscience that they placed the stamps on their letters only after they had clipped off the perforations. They had been using stamps out stamps for sixty years and See and not propose that any unchanged arrangement should have consequences for them. They were so accustomed to seeing the trimmed stamps that the perforated ones did not have the proper appearance.—Chicago Record.

How to Make Napkin Rings of Bark.

Napkin rings for use during the stay in the country may be made from birch bark. Cut the bark in a strip about the proper width for a ring. Sew the ends together with a feather stitch with Roman floss. Feather stitch each edge with the same material, and in the center of the ring work an initial or monogram. If several are to be used, work them with different colors.
