

I cannot complete with you in the market, please marry me, and I will give you with all the discom-not marry him? Yes, unless some tragic circumstance holds her back from her heart's desire. Let me tell a story of a young woman now employed in one of the government departments in Washington. She is thirty-four years old, and receives a salary of $300 a year. She supports her mother, her invalid father, two young sisters, and a decrepit grand-loved and cared for. Her case is not a peculiarly American case; I could duplicate it in England. Women work because they are self-respecting and because they must. They work because in this enlightened age they have learned to look upon marriage as something more than a mere vocation, a means of livelihood. In this twentieth century it is getting to be looked upon as a disgrace, a disreputable thing, for a woman to marry for the sake of a home.

quent and better opportunities for happy marriage than has her stay-at-home sister. Throughout England, and in some of the smaller villages of the eastern part of the United States one frequently comes upon families including four or five spinsters with ages ranging from twenty-eight to fifty, women who have stuck close to the home circle, having just enough to eat, sleeping two in a room, with no such thing as privacy for the growth of their souls. Denied all the pretty frilleries that women love, such as dainty clothing, or pretty toilet accessories, never seeing a man except in the presence of one another, knowing nothing of the real world of men and women who fight and struggle, who win and lose—and in their losing still thank God that they fought to the end. Do such women have proper opportunities for marriage, even granting for the sake of argument that marriage is their true sphere? Would they not have had a better chance in London, in New York, working in offices during the day, earning decent incomes, wearing becoming gowns and hats, knowing something of the joy of life? "But they forfeit the chivalry of men!" They do not! Out of the volume of a varied experience in England and the United States I speak with a certain knowledge of facts beyond dispute. Chivalry cannot die out because of woman's growth and development and improvement. The man who declines to lift his hat to a woman because she runs a typewriting machine is not a man, but a cad. The man who whines that he is out of place because a woman applied for his position and demonstrated her ability to do his work, according to the law of the survival of the fittest, ought to be pushed to the wall. He belongs in the ranks of the wall-flowers.

to remove his hat in my presence, will sit in a tramway-car while I hang on to a strap, will fail to pick up my pocket-handkerchief for me. I can get on without the seat in the tramway-car or the handkerchief I have dropped, but I must have bread. Not only bread with I have. I want butter on it, also some marmalade. I won't even deny that I can eat even greater luxuries with a relish. If I can earn the money to gratify these natural longings of the natural human being, shall I not earn it? And if while I earn it any so-called man fails to encourage me by lifting his hat to me—why, then, let him keep it on.
