POULTRY FARMING.

Another Expert Has "Views" as How to Start Right.

In poultry farming as in other farming equal success comes through the combination of a "business head," invested capital, and a fair run of something which, if we do not call it luck, means nearly the same thing. It is hardly to expect only a moderate income and fair returns on one's capital than to dream of keeping five thousand hens and gathering in five thousand eggs every day.

How much money is absolutely necessary in making a start is a difficult question to answer, for fifty dollars in some hands and in some neighborhoods is worth two hundred in other hands and place which bears the hardships of beginning, patience which does not give up the struggle when discouragement comes, so it inevitably will come some day, and cheery hope which sees reward ahead are all to be counted in as capital. "Beginning without capital" is an expression often heard, but there really is no such thing, for if one depends at first on other work, and spends only pin money on poultry, his living expenses all the time should justly be reckoned as invested capital.

We know one girl whose friends said that she had begun poultry farming on an investment of $25, but the truth was that although she spent only that modest sum on a trio of fine chickens, some common hens and a rough little house, her maintenance in the family home until her flock had increased to large proportions, and the rent of the farm over which her chickens had free range, corresponded to a capital of $500. And that is one of the best points about raising chickens; one can be bringing ground for a profitable crop of them while earning a living in some other way, cultivating strawberries or choice vegetables. The farmer's thrifty daughter, or the schoolmistress who wants only some work, may buy a few eggs and a "nipedy" hen to cover their and three years afterward sell hundreds of dollars' worth of thoroughbred stock, but she should remember that her opportunity was capital to her.

When one man, in the beginning, hires or buy land and build all kinds of houses, he should look at the matter in a businesslike way, and count on getting simply a reasonable per cent. on his investment. "How many hens must I keep in order to support a family of six persons?" was a question asked recently by a reader, as if it were a settled fact that a hen could support a given number of persons or fractions thereof. Seven thousand hens might—probably would—bankrupt a farmer, while with two hundred he could earn his living. One dollar a year is supposed to be the average profit from an average hen. If the hen is young, smart and pure bred she should bring her owner more money than that.

As a general average there are one-third as many eggs each day as there are hens if in flocks of over twenty. Of course there are fewer eggs in early winter and more in early spring. Hens kept in groups of six or seven, for better, or many days every hen furnishing her "season for being." So that if one had 100 hens in flocks of fifty one probably would have 100 eggs a day. If kept in flocks of fifteen there would often be 50. As a rule that increase repays one for the cost of extra buildings. Twenty-five "biddies" make a good, manageable family.

Before one can see clearly how much money he will need he must decide upon the path he is going to follow; whether he will raise pure stock or market poultry, or turn his attention to "new laid eggs." Probably he will branch off in some way he did not expect, but a well considered plan will keep him from wandering about bewildered whether to sell his eggs at fifty cents a dozen or keep them to hatch into chickens worth fifty cents a pound.—American Agriculturist.

THOUGHT HE'D TAKE A DAY OFF.

A Northern New York Editor's Reply to a Committee of Church Folks.

A leading editorial note of Cincinnati gave a dinner party. Around the board were several New Yorkers who, toward the end of the feast, told stories out of their religious experiences.

"Up in Lansome county," said a grim looking party, grizzly of hair, square of jaw and deliberate, as if addressing a jury, "there was once a worthy elder of the church named Joe Potter. Joe was a real fearing man, a good husband and father, upright in his business as a farmer and a most respectable citizen every way. One day he hitched his team, loaded it with produce and went to Potsdam. Night fell, but Joe did not come. His family were greatly alarmed. His son posted off with all haste to Potsdam, only to learn that his father sold his house and potatoes and started off homeward a little before dark.

"Search proved unavailing, but the next afternoon up drove Joe's horse to the gate broken in pieces and all of a lather. His master slowly descended to the ground, a sorry spectacle—his clothes torn, his face badly bruised, part of his front scalp missing. With anxiously steps Joe found his room. Next day the minister and the other elders of the church called upon him.

"'Brother Potter,' said the man of God, 'we visit you to have some explanation of the extraordinary events which have overtaken you this week.'

"'How long her I bin a member of the church, boy and man?'

"'Forty-six years, my brother.'

"'Ain't I walked in the ways of the Lord pretty perpendickler deorin' that time?'

"'Yes, my brother; few have been privileged to serve the Lord so well.'

"'Six and forty year is a posty good while, ain't it?'

"'Yes, my brother.'

"'Well, I thought so, too, and so I kinder thought I'd take a day off.'"

The story teller was Thomas G. Shearman, the million superintendent of Plymouth Sunday school.—New York Sun.
