TRANSPLANTING OUTFIT.

Transplanting Machines Used by Market Gardeners—Development of the Scheme.

"A team of steady horses, a man and two boys are in their proper places on a Bemis transplanter, constructed up to date transplanting outfit. The extensive tobacco growers and market gardeners of today consider these transplanting machines a necessary part of their outfits. The machine cut out the fields, therefore, so much to suit for a trip. It is a very excellent machine, exactly suited to the needs of those men," writes Professor Green, of the Wisconsin experiment station. The gardener on a small scale and the farmer, however, cannot afford to pay $75 or more for a machine that would be used but an hour or two each season, so the writer quotes from the following item, entering the middle, where The Rural New Yorker publishes with illustrations:

DEVELOPMENT OF THE SPADE.

The dibble, or setter, is still the only tool employed by the majority of gardeners in transplanting. The first gardener probably used the dibble shown at 1.

Shortly after the first gardener's fingers were worn off, he devised another either by cutting off the upper eight or ten inches of a rotted fork handle, and sharpening the cut end like 2. This was used forever after by this gardener, and by many generations of his descendants. It saved the fingers, but in the palms of the hand was a very sore spot for weeks after transplanting, and besides he could not properly press the soil around the roots of the plant after it was placed in the hole made for it. The roots also were bruised.

One of his descendants improved on the fork handle by making a dibble with a curved top of handle and adding a metal tip like 3. This was a good move, but the same objections apply to this as to the fork handle. Later on the fork handle was changed for the spade handle. Then came the improvement of flattening the shank instead of making it round. This was the general shape up to that time. The opening in the ground made by this tool was such as to allow the soil to be turned out in a fan shape and the soil to be pressed firmly about them. Neither the fingers nor the palm suffered when this tool was used, but alas! for the wrist. In using it the wrist joint needs to be flexible and enduring to withstand the strain.

The next and most important move in the evolution of the tool was the construction, by a professor in horticulture, of the one shown at 5. After using it for several seasons the writer quoted does not hesitate to recommend it as the most perfect tool of its kind yet devised. The handle is 1½ inches in diameter and exactly fits the hand. The blade is of steel 7 inches long, 1¾ inches wide at the top, tapering to one-half inch, and should be made sufficiently heavy so that it will not spring, even in hard ground. It is not patented and can be made by a blacksmith for 50 cents.

In the Next States.

The benefits of the Carey act that granted a million acres to each of the arid states will be still further enlarged by the bill passed by the United States senate, and which will be, in all probability, the bill that will become a law. It permits the state, in the exercise of the trust created, may attach to each acre a fee for the cost of its reclamation. The new measure also provides that when the water supply shall have been furnished, patents shall issue for the lands.
