THE BEST OF ALL.

It was early morning and the good house wife was still as its mistress passed with noiseless footsteps along the empty halls, down the back stairway and into the kitchen. There was no parlor maid busy with brooms and dustcloths; no chambermaid with pitchers of hot water and piles of towels going about her morning duties; no sound of singing or jargon of merry voices ground her ear as she held her head on the front of the door that led into the basement kitchen; no appetizing odor of breakfast cakes, beefsteak and hot coffee saluted her nostrils as she swung the door open and entered. She put her hand to her heart with a gesture as if it pained her, as she murmured, half aloud, "It might be Tompson's Sleeping Pulses for all the signs of life there are here." Then she stopped, just across the threshold, and made a movement indicative of surprise. In the range she had expected to find cold and black and unadorned a ruddy fire was burning. The kettle on top of it was boiling and singing, emitting a cloud of steam, and its cover was bobbing up and down.

At this unexpected sight a half smile came to her lips, and again she soliloquized, "The pixies somehow have entirely been here before me." Then she looked at her house—the well preserved, delicate hands of a middle aged woman to whom fortune had been kind—kinds that tell life the tales that remained in wrinkles, veiled not, neither had they spoke. "I am glad," thought she. "That the pixies come. I should hardly know how to make a dinner with no fire in it."

Mr. and Mrs. Bertram Wayne had married for love, when they were young and poor, and had been happy. But the young husband had a taste for money making, given the opportunity, and as is not always the case the opportunity presented itself. It does not all matter whether it was in oil or gas, or what other branch of profitable investment, his little capital was turned over and over and swelled and grew, and the income increased and multiplied itself again and again.

It is only to the purpose here to state that by strictly legitimate methods of business Mr. Bertram Wayne had, inside of 15 or 20 years, grown to be a rich man—not a millionaire, to be sure, by any means, but wealthy enough to move out of the pretty cottage in which he and his wife had begun their married life into a spacious dwelling in a more fashionable part of town and set up an expensive establishment, with a complicated system of household service. And, as is usual under such circumstances, Mr. Wayne became too busy to adding to his principal and multiplying his interest to give much attention to home affairs. He furnished the money and invited to his wife to spend it in inaugurating the whole of the pandemonium domestic machinery.

Mr. Wayne gave her time, as was necessary, to her servants' society and the course and art of entertaining, for "when good fortune they are bestowed that set them." Both she and her husband were members of their several clubs, and the wife was a directress in half a dozen institutions—societies for the promotion of various laudable objects—all of which demanded time and attention. Sometimes in the rush and whirl of it all she could not help wondering if she had had children of her own what would have become of them.

In the course of time it came about quite naturally, in order to avoid clashing with each other's hours of rest and retirement, each being busy in divers ways, that they occupied separate suites of apartments, seldom meeting save at table or perhaps for a little time in the early evening.

And now, by no fault of his own and with nothing to reproach himself for, but owing to the uncertain condition of the times, the fortune had collapsed, the house was gone, and the varied occupations of husband and wife had disappeared. In a few days the costly furniture would be scattered off, the house sold, and empty handed, they would begin life over again.

When Mr. Wayne came in with a bit of beefsteak he had just bought, he found his wife standing at the table alertness something with an iron spoon in a yellow bowl. She looked up and smiled at him. "I am making drop biscuit," she said. "Do you remember how fond of them you used to be when we first kept house?" Some half forgotten memory stirred in the husband's heart, and he put his arm about her neck and kissed her forehead. Her heart thrilled beneath the touch and was as in bad not thrilled for years. No diamond necklace or other precious material gift could have brought so pretty a flush, so full of pleasure, to her cheek.

When breakfast was ready and they sat down together alone to serve themselves, she confessed that she had been doubtful about quantities used in her drop biscuit. It had been so long since she had made any. But although they were rather pale, as if from too much cake, the husband, coming more and more under the happy spell of the olden time, honestly declared that they were delicious.

He sighed when her fair hands plunged into the dishwater pan, but he no longer the wealthy capitalist, took up the tea towel with a certain sort of pleasure to dry the breakfast china. "Don't you remember?" and "Have you forgotten?" formed the staple of their conversation. And it is true, mingled with the lamentatory sigh or surreptitious tear, for the grim specter of poverty, by whatever wreathed, is something of which human creatures are sore afraid. As Dante truly says, it is

"Love worse than death by just sound, and with the leaking of all hearts adorned."

Still there is poverty and poverty, and form of which differs essentially from the other. And when the tea towel had been hung on the rack behind the range fire Only Taylor sat down in one of the kitchen chairs at hand and took his wife upon his knee. It did not occur to him that she was heavier than she used to be. He only thought how soft her cheek felt as it lay against his own and wondered how it was that it had been so long since last he felt it there. They had told her, in a remarking way, he had heard them would be a little left, as orange from the wreck, when all was settled up, enough to rent a tiny house like that they used to live in long ago, with a maid of all work in the kitchen to do the roughest part of the household labor. He had had an offer of a situation at $1,200 a year. Didn't that look big to her? She laughed a little hysterically. "But, darling," said he in a hoarse half whisper, "you have proved to me we shall, after all, save the most valuable of all our possessions—and I thank God for it—our love for each other."

At this Mrs. Wayne forgot all about her vanished wealth and its splendors. With a fond, inextinguishable joy she drew her arms closely round her husband's neck and yielded to the emotion of joy which he charged her to his breast.—Minnie Maher Miller in Cincinnati Post.

Hints in Potato Culture.

In a valuable bulletin on potato experiments from the Illinois station the assistant horticulturist says on the subject of distance apart of planting:

This has been made a subject of study in eight states, and the average of the results goes to prove the common practice among farmers to be correct. Hills have seldom given as good yields as drills.

In drilling potatoes, Michigan makes a distinction between planting whole potatoes and pieces and recommends for single eyes 12 to 15 inches apart, for half potatoes 2 feet apart and for whole potatoes 2½ feet apart.

Ohio says results show that rows should be from 2½ to 3 feet apart and the hills a foot. This is supposing one or two eye pieces are used for seed.

In 33 trials of hill as compared with drill planting in Michigan, the results were in favor of drills.

The New York experiment station at Geneva reports in favor of drill planting.

Wisconsin has found no material difference between hills and drills.

Potatoes For Stock.

Exhaustive experiments are reported by the French Society of Agriculture in which a ration composed chiefly of potatoes afforded rapid gains to live weights of both sheep and cattle, a large percentage in dressed weight of the slaughtered animals and flesh of excellent quality. Cooked potatoes proved more effective and profitable than uncooked.
