AVENGING HER OWN MISTAKE.

A Terrible Scolding Received by a Postal Clerk for a Woman's Error.

There was something decidedly belligerent in her appearance as she approached the money order window at the postoffice just before closing time the other day, and sharply said, "Do you remember me?"

"No, madam, I can't say that I do," replied the clerk.

"You don't, eh?" continued the visitor. "Well, I'm not at all surprised at that. I didn't suppose you would admit that you had ever seen me before. But I remember you, just the same, and perhaps that will do just as well. There is no mistake about it. I know you; you are the fellow I'm after; I'd know you anywhere."

"I don't understand you, madam, I assure you. What can I do for you?"

"Do! Do! Why, pay me back my money! I don't care to make any unnecessary trouble for you, but I don't propose to be robbed in this way, that's all."

"Pray calm yourself, madam. Now, then, what is it? Something about money?"

"Have you the brazen impudence to stand there and tell me that you didn't get it?"

"Perhaps—I don't know. I receive a great deal of money here sometimes. What are you talking about?"

"You know very well what I am talking about. I'll admit that the amount ain't very large, but it is plenty large enough and I'm going to have it, too. It's the principle I care for more than the money itself."

"That's right. How much was it?"

"Don't try that dodge, young man. You know the amount well enough. I paid it to you myself. But you never sent it—you just pocketed it. It is of no use to deny it. I can prove it and I want that money back or there will be trouble."

"Aha! I see. You paid me some money. When was it and how much was it?"

"I came here a week before Christmas and paid you $10 to be sent to my sister in Rockford. I handed the money to you, right here, and you know it."

"Well?"

"Well! She hasn't received the money. You never sent it. You tried to keep it. But I was smart enough to keep the receipt you gave me, and I've got it yet; so I don't propose to be swindled, and don't you forget it!"

"Hm! Yes. You must have been very thoughtful. So I really gave you a receipt, did I? I must have forgotten it. Just look at the date of that receipt, will you, please?"

From the mysterious depths of her pocket the woman fished up a crinkled and folded paper which proved to be a money order payable at the Rockford postoffice. The purchaser had mistaken it for a receipt for the money which she paid the clerk.

The nature and value of the "receipt" were fully explained, and as its possessor left the building she bestowed upon the clerk a glare which was so chilly that it completely covered the money order window with frost.—Chicago Mail.

A Man Who Is Seldom Loved.

Some ill tempered men are loved not only beyond their deserts but beyond what one might think possible. Perhaps this is because they make up for their defects by an unusual warmth of affection; but there is one description of ill tempered man who is never liked, whether he receives a dutiful affection or not, and that is the man who always insists on having his own way. A passionate man is not always, perhaps not often, in a rage; a sulky fellow is not perpetually sulky, but an exacting man is continually irritating.

There are people who quietly, and perhaps good humoredly, but with fixed determination, insist that other people's preferences shall give way to theirs; and who, if they are thwarted, make themselves infinitely disagreeable. A man of this stamp may have many good qualities; he may be respected, but he cannot be loved. Not even his nearest relations can avoid feeling a certain constraint in his presence and a sense of relief when he is absent. The flower of love may live through many injuries, but it cannot survive in an atmosphere of perpetual frost.—Chambers' Journal.

An Old Story in a New Dress.

Two men met in Tombstone the other night who had not seen each other in fifteen years. When they had talked together for ten minutes they discovered that they had both been on a coroner's jury in Montana, which, to say the least, was a remarkable case. The case was one of a man found drowned in the Yellowstone river; his body was brought to the coroner's rooms, the jury summoned and the body examined. In the hip pocket of his overalls was found a Colt's six shooter and in another pocket a $20 gold piece. The justice, who was also a coroner, as is also the rule in Arizona at the present time, fined the corpse $20 for carrying a concealed weapon, and then went on with the inquest.—Tombstone Prospector.

It is said of Senator Teller that he is a man of such careless and indifferent appetite that he doesn't care whether he has a five course and remove dinner or a free lunch of pickled tripe.

Finding People Who Have Moved.

Many persons are surprised that they cannot procure the address of some one who has moved away from his old residence, and not left the new address with the janitor of the building he had occupied, from the postoffice or branch office situated in the district where he had resided. They go to the postoffice to ask for such address in good faith, but are always refused, as there is a stringent rule against the giving of such information by the postoffice authorities.

The idea of the postoffice people is that a man's letters and papers are strictly confidential, and the outside address also. A letter carrier that gives any information concerning mail matter he may have in his charge to any person except the one to whom the letters are addressed is liable to dismissal from the service, and in case of suspension or transfer.

All sorts of inquiries come into the postoffice regarding persons who receive mail matter. Parties in search of debtors are the most frequent inquirers. Others are those who have sold goods on an installment and cannot find the parties who have taken them, and then disappeared, leaving a balance due. Sewing machine agents ask after those who have disappeared with machines, not having paid for them.

There is only one way to find out the addresses of parties through the postoffice, and that is by addressing a letter to the old address of the person sought. The postoffice authorities are bound to deliver the letter. Of course this is not available to those in search of people against whom they hold claims, but when an address is sought by a friend he may be pretty sure that a letter will find the person to whom it is addressed.—New York Times.

Fraudulent Giants.

The teeth and bones of the fossil elephants found in Europe were formerly assigned to giants, and many remarkable stories were circulated regarding what was supposed to have been an extinct race of men "with teeth weighing from four to ten pounds." The last of these finds, which was believed to be the remains of a giant of the genus homo, was discovered during the reign of Louis XIV, and was referred to as the giant of Dauphine.

These gigantic remains were discovered by a surgeon, who stated they were inclosed in an enormous sepulchre, covered with a stone slab, which bore the inscription, "Teutobochus rex," and that in the vicinity there were also found coins and medals, all of which showed the remains to be those of a giant king of Cimbri, who fought against Marius and was slain. It was afterward proved that the surgeon-discoverer of these gigantic remains was as great a fraud as the man who manufactured the plaster cast known as the "Cardiff Giant."—St. Louis Republic.

Too Many Meals.

There is, says Dr. Andrew Clark, growing up in the working world a habit of having far too frequent meals in the day and far too much variety at them. Meals should not be multiplied in the way they now are. The plan of having tea before breakfast, lunch at 11 o'clock, then dinner, tea again in the afternoon and supper at night is about the worst plan that can be adopted. Nurses should have three meals a day—good, sensible meals of fresh, simple, nourishing food. Women have but one notion about food, and that is that the oftener they eat and the more varied the food the better they will be. This is a mistake.

Having three simple meals of plain, nourishing food, and nothing between them, is the best way of sustaining the health and of supporting the body. The diet of twenty-five years ago, when nurses had plain bread and butter for breakfast at half past 6, a dinner consisting of a joint at 1, and a cold meat supper, was much more fitting for the maintenance of health and the support of the working powers than the diet of the present day.

Children should be well fed. Some are overfed, but far more are underfed. They should be fed on abundance of bread, milk, eggs, rice, barley, and oatmeal in every form.—Hall's Journal of Health.

Danger in Wearing Rubbers.

A chiropodist says: Since the streets became so muddy I have had a number of sufferers apply to me for relief. If a man has a corn I can take it out and relieve him, but if he is suffering from what I call "rubber fever" I can't help him and can only prescribe liberal foot bathing and a removal of the cause of the trouble. Rubbers should only be worn to keep wet out, and they should be removed the moment the wearer gets indoors. Failure to note this gives a man wet feet in a far worse sense than if he had waded through mud ankle deep. It was the trouble resulting from forcing the perspiration to soak the stockings and keep the feet perpetually damp that drove rubber soled boots out of the market. Even loose rubbers are a source of danger and the cause of many more serious colds than they avert.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Not All Men Smoke.

It is not true that "all men smoke." It would be safe to say that at least one-third of the full grown men in this city never use tobacco in any shape. This conclusion has been reached by the present writer after inquiry and observation. Not one-third of the pedestrians in the streets are to be seen smoking at any hour of the day or evening. In several large business establishments, which may be taken as examples of concerns of that kind, it was found that just about one-third of the employes were smokers. In an uptown club three-quarters of the members were found to be smokers. In a number of big boarding houses a majority of the boarders were smokers. It is of course impossible to tell the exact proportion of the population that is given to habitual smoking; but let it stand at two-thirds until the statistics are furnished by the Anti-Tobacco society.—New York Sun.

What Celluloid Consists of.

The base of celluloid is common paper, by action of sulphuric and nitric acids it is changed to gun cotton, then dried, ground and mixed with from 20 to 40 per cent. of camphor, after which it is ground fine, colored with powder colors, cast in sheets, pressed very hard, and at last baked in [illegible] of superheated rollers.—Current Literature.
