SPEECH
OF
Gov. S. H. Elbert,
OF COLORADO,

BEFORE THE CONVENTION OF TRANSMISSOURI STATES AND TERRITORIES, HELD AT DENVER, COLORADO, OCTOBER 15TH, 1873.

[illegible] and does not [illegible] crops sometimes realized, nor the perfection and great size of our grains and vegetables. I have no hesitancy in saying that the agricultural products exhibited at the last annual fair of the Colorado Industrial Association are unsurpassed on the coast.

Colorado is a type of the entire region, and her irrigable agriculture of the last ten years proves her lands, as wheat lands especially, equal to the best lands of the North-west, as the black lands of Illinois and Ohio do.

Again, agriculture by irrigation is not subject to the contingencies of drought or freshet, which result in the failure of entire crops over large districts of country. These advantages are not contingent, but constant, and far more than compensate for the additional expense of canal construction and manipulation of the water. The testimony of farmers who have tried both systems, is universally in favor of agriculture by irrigation.

Again, the water used in irrigation comes freighted with fertilizing matter in solution, and deposits largely what the growing crops extract. Thus a constant system of fertilization is supplied without cost of transportation or distribution.

This fact, I am satisfied, is not fully appreciated. It forms a prominent feature in European irrigations.

A writer in speaking of the fertilizing sediment of the Moselle, a river of France, says:

"Though apparently very pure its waters are highly charged with fertilizing material in solution, which it leaves as an alluvial crust upon the stones. Below Epinal it has been made to redeem and fertilize broad gravelly beds, transforming them into beautiful green meadows, yielding crops of two to four tons per acre. * * *

A slight deposit of mud is left, which is increased with each flood in the river. After a year the meadow begins to yield. In three years it attains a full vigor, which it never loses. The meadows begun in 1807 have never been renewed, plowed up or manured, yet their crops are as good as ever."

Speaking of the same subject Reclus says: "As an instance, let us take the Durance, a French river, which has been thoroughly surveyed and studied to ascertain the plan for utilizing its waters and sediment for the irrigation and manuring of the plains by the river side.

"According to the observations of M. Herre Mangon, which lasted from the first of November, 1859, to the 31st of October, 1860, the mass of sediment brought down by the stream during the whole year represents a quantity of near 18,000,000 tons." If spread out uniformly on the ground this alluvium would cover in a year more than 198,000 acres with a layer an inch thick. I give these two illustrations because of their figures."

Many other illustrations might be given, but these will suffice.

Now, sir, I do not pretend to say that our rivers will furnish any such supply of fertilizing matter, but what I claim is this, that the rivers mentioned are types of all rivers, and that the streams of this arid region turned into canals will freight to the arid lands over which they are poured immense quantities of fertilizing elements, which constitute one of the substantial and valuable qualities.

This is local experience.

The history of other countries, ancient and modern, are full of proofs of successful agriculture by irrigation. I go into this summary for two reasons. First, to show the advantages of irrigable agriculture. Second, to show that the system which has made other arid countries the gardens of the world will do the same for this.

Mr. Marsh says:

"There are few things in continental husbandry which surprise English or American observers so much as the extent to which irrigation is employed in agriculture. In Southern Europe, in the Turkish Empire, and in many other countries a very large proportion of the surface is if not absolutely flooded at least thoroughly moistened by irrigation during the hottest months in the course of every season.

"Lombardy has a population of over 3,000,000, or 480 persons to the square mile—the densest population of Europe. Two-thirds of her population are engaged in agriculture, and it is the best cultivated country of Europe.

"Irrigation from the streams flowing from the Alps afford ample facilities, is universally and skillfully employed. The quantity irrigated in 1856 was estimated at 1,100,000 acres. The rivers in the Piedmontese dominions that [illegible] without a copious supply. The purchase and sale of water for irrigation forms a business of considerable importance. The state claims the water of all the rivers of Lombardy, and in the Venetian Territories all the springs and collections of rain water belong to the government. The use of the water is rented out at a certain price by the hour or the half hour, or for so many days at certain seasons. Irrigated lands rent for one-third more than other lands. In Piedmont, in the intense heat of the summer, the plains become so scorched that crops are only saved by irrigation, which is developed to great perfection. Over half a million acres are scored with artificial channels, and for the privilege of using the water a tax is levied. The increased rental of irrigated lands in Lombardy and Piedmont is estimated at $4,500,000.

"Thus districts once waste and inhabited by a scanty and impoverished population, have been reclaimed and support the densest population of Europe."

The main stream of the Po has been utilized by the construction of the great canal of Cavour. Reclus says:

"Since the above date (1863,) the great Cavour canal has been opened—a perfect artificial river [illegible] requires for itself alone [illegible] yards of water a second. Starting from Chivosso [illegible] river, which is not [illegible] five yards wide at [illegible] ment, spreads its fertilizing water on both sides in the [illegible] plains of Lomellina [illegible] route numerous streams [illegible] the Sesia, the Agogna, the Po—and at Turbigo [illegible] the Tesino all [illegible] liquid mass after [illegible] more than [illegible] the great canal [illegible] Hindostan it is the most important operation of this kind accomplished in modern times. There can be no doubt that the Po, once so dreaded on account of its sudden floods, will ultimately become [illegible] conjunction with the other water courses of Lombardy a scientifically arranged system of agriculture."
