BELOW OCEAN WAVES

LIFE AT GREAT AND ALMOST UNFATHOMABLE DEPTHS.

Strange and Startling Structures of the Denizens of the Deep—Creatures Way Down There Even Crowded From the Surface of the Sea.

For a century or more naturalists have been a great deal concerning the marine organisms which dwell in the sunless waters near the shore. They have long learned the amazing richness of these littoral forms. The census of Kerguelen island more than 100,000 dredgings, it is, however, of late that people have ascribed that the deeper parts of the ocean floors have also their peculiar and varied peoples. The prime part of these shore dwellers are exceedingly intolerant of the enormous pressure of the deeper waters, as well as of the low temperature and total darkness which exists there.

Certain forms have, however, acquired the ability to withstand these peculiar conditions, as generation by generation through the geologic ages they have crept away from the realms of those animal and the shores to the less comfortable fields of the open and deeper sea. Through all the geologic ages the selection of especially prepared groups for the singular stations or habitat of the ocean depths has been going on, with the result that those dark and pressure burdened regions are now tenanted by uniformly peculiar animals, by species which ever surprise the student who is accustomed alone to the forms which dwell near the shore.

One of the most striking features connected with the animals of the deep sea is its frequency with which we find their living specimens which remind us of kinds which in former geologic periods dwell in the coastal districts of the ocean. It seems that many of these ancient creatures, when they could no longer hold their own against the more highly organized and developed animals which inhabited the favored stations near the shores, shrunk away into the deep water, and in that undesired part of the world found an asylum, where, and the dangerous environment, they here dwelt for ages unmolested. Thus the vast profounds of the deep have become a sort of abodeness, wherein the antiquated forms have retired before the overwhelming pressure which the newer and higher life ever imposes on its ancestors.

From the results of the relatively trifling explorations which have yet been made, there seems good reason to hope that in time we may win from the deep the secrets lying representatives of many creatures which once occupied a large place in the sea, but now have vanished into the folds of more active commerce, which are usually the seat of the greatest advances.

In the profounder zone the invertebrate life appears to have a larger share than is secured by the vertebrate or backboned animals, yet there are a number of fishes known in these depths, and it seems likely that these tenants of the deep may be numbered by thousands of species. Among the finest tenants of the profounder parts of the ocean we find the most startling departures from the types with which we are familiar in coastal waters. In general shape they differ little from their kindred which dwell in the coastal shallows.

The differences are largely in the mechanism of the senses, especially of the eyes. These organs undergo surprising variations with reference to the enduring of the darkness of these deeps. In certain of the species the sight not only fails, but the visual apparatus entirely disappears; in others the eyeball becomes very much enlarged and the nervous apparatus increased, and are evidently arranged to catch more glimpses of the light. As it is certain that no trace of sunlight can ever penetrate through the deep which overlies the realm where these animals dwell, the adaptation of these eyes to the needs of different colors at first appeared to be a very inexplicable matter.

Some recent discoveries provide us with what seems to be an adequate explanation of the enigma. It has been found that certain of the denizens of the deep sea floors have phosphorescent parts of their bodies which serve to give light in a manner in which it is yielded by the familiar fireflies and glowworms.

The end secured by these light giving parts is probably the attraction of the sexual mates of the creatures. In the utter darkness of the ocean this indispensable end could be attained in no other way.—Professor N. S. Shaler in Scribner's.

What Indians Worship.

The natural configuration of many mountains suggests the human face, and such physiognomies cut out of the rocks on a gigantic scale are commonly regarded by savages as objects of worship. Ellen Russell Emerson says that the Thunder Bird of the Thlinkits is described by them as a giant nest dwelling in the sacred hills. When in want of food he provides himself with a pair of wings and a mask in the shape of a bird's head, the latter having a beak as sharp as a knife and "a tongue that makes fire."

This arrayed the god spreads his wings and sails over the ocean in search of a whale. By his side and attached to his waist is the lightning demon, which darts upon the prey and fetches it to the hungry god.—Washington Star.

Bought Up Offending Organs.

A story is related of the composer Verdi that has to do with organs. One time a friend while visiting him was shown through the composer's home. When the door was opened into one room it was found to be filled with barrel organs of all sizes and patterns.

"What on earth are you doing with all these?" asked the astonished friend.

"These are a few that have annoyed me with 'La Mascotte,'" answered the great artist, "and they will never do so again."—New York World.

New Stationery Cabinet.

A novel stationery cabinet has the writing pad in the center, with two deep pockets for paper and envelopes, one at each end.—Decorator and Furnisher.

There are hermits in China who bear out their eyes in order, they say, that by closing the two gates of love they may open the thousand gates of wisdom.
