A Brilliant Contraband.

A proof-reader, in the course of an exhibition in New York recently, had one of the professors select several from a pack and then he handed a sheet of paper to another professor, a Frenchman, who was sitting at the other end of the table. The professor, who did not see the card, mentioned that after it had been returned to the pack the professor of it would be found written on the paper. The card was the eight of hearts. It was found on the paper, as he said, "It is the eight of hearts," asked the professor. "That's all right," answered the third looking man. But he was a very conscientious man, and here he insisted on telling the audience that the professor had written on the sheet of paper, as "Mark's all right."
