WOMAN AND HOME.

GRANDMAMMA'S FAN.

They sticks and pulsted fans,
Bits of yellow, tattered lace,
That survive in place,
Dusty only marred by age,
Bits a treasure I engage
When the second was the rage.

Fancy I see me for now—
Powdered locks above my brow,
Sweeping courtesy, bending low;
Such a dainty, graceful bow—
One hand holds her stiff brocade,
Other wields the sequin's aid.

Our her little hand well curled
Spreads the silken, ivory orbed,
How it twinkle—seen it's twirled
To command a stolen glance,
Or a crimson grace permance,
As she treads the stately dance.

Gleaming, fleeting vision fair,
Phantom years and powdered hair,
Earthly sunshine gleaming here—
Time rolls backward for a space,
Gives me the sweet, old face,
Gleams the twinkle of its fan.

CONTENTMENT.

A Lesson That Should Be Taught Every Daughter in the Broad Land.

If I had a dozen daughters—which I haven't—there is one lesson I should try to teach them above all others, the lesson of simple content. I do not mean, of course, I should wish them to be dowdies, to be pale and restless, with no hopes, no ambitions to stir them mentally and say, "Walk in this and there is no use trying to change it; might as well be satisfied." I like people who work and their plans steadily and faithfully, and I like people who have grey, this most free of unrest that interrupt one's ease or calm!

It must be rich enough to dine with princes, or he must have a name that will entitle him to a place, even though it be the lowest, at an earl's table. Look at our young girls! We dressed them here and everything under the sun save a beer, sine-qua-non, and that they long to be a society queen, another an actress—to elevate the drama—another an artist—to elevate a public singer. How few aspire to perfection some work that will not demand that the "beautiful crowd" cast flowers and laudatives at their feet.

How few select a work that means living a simple, clean, innocent life, doing whatsoever comes to their hands and keeping a song in their hearts for the dear ones who make up their little world. Take the average maiden, too, of this same great middle class, and discover her ideal of a husband. Is it the strong bodied, broad chested unconscious in working clothes, whose strength makes us think he's, but whose heart is tender as a child's—who would love her, protect her, work for her till he fell dead?

Or is it the dainty young man, who has white hands and a great display of collar and cuff, who wears showy fancy and some darling diamonds, and rolls pretty cigarettes, who can dance into the ear of his fingers—all on fifty dollars a month? I once heard a young woman who was "engaged" to such a youth say, with a tone of her good, foolish head, "I shall have a servant. George doesn't believe in women doing household drudgery, and neither do I. He says we will dress well and be genteel, even if we die in a garret some we are old."

Poor child! That set me to wondering what they will have for dinner, if Santa and cheap fancy were their idea of "gentility," on the enormous salary of $600 a year.

On the other hand, I once had a dear friend who had been accustomed from infancy to every comfort and luxury heart could desire. She married a young preacher whose salary was fifty dollars a month. They furnished three small rooms in the plainest manner possible, set Monday's washing on the windows, and singing birds outside, let in the air and sunlight, and in every corner they set up an invisible altar to love. When I try to picture contentment I think of that home.

There were two people with refined tastes who longed for books, pictures, music, souvenirs, heirlooms, bibelots, all the pleasant things that mean money, and they gave up everything and everybody else that they might be together, might make happy surroundings, one for the other. It requires more strength, more faith, more nobility to live such a life—and live it beautifully and cheerfully—than it does to become a great actress or a great singer or a society queen. But such a life, dear, is what I mean by content.—Ella Higginson in Week Shore.

The First Woman's Club.

Miss Anthony tells the history of the first woman's club which was formed in the good old days before the advancement of woman, the organization of unions, co-operative societies and suffrage associations, nor ever dreamed of by the good wives who knitted their own stockings, baked their own bread, wove their own cloth, and made their own soap in singleness of purpose. The bigoments in the little town of Oneida had at one time a habit of spending the entire evening in a social way at the "tavern," leaving their respective spouses to while away the lonely evening hours alone with their knitting at home.

The wives, fired with a little of the flame of independence which now makes women so free from the old time shackles of widhood and motherhood, met together, sat upon a plan which seemed expedient, and on a fine evening they filed into the barroom together, sat down with their knitting and began to chat together as if the smoke filled room were one of their own immaculate parlors at home. The men were in a boom early that night thinking it all a joke. But the next evening, no sooner had they lighted their pipes and commenced telling the stories in which the habitues of the place were well versed, then in walked the wives en masse and sat down with their knitting. It is needless to say the men left the place, as men invariably do when women are determined, and kept their wives no longer in solitude.—New York Sun.

Cutting Velvet.

The amateur dressmaker has usually a number of pets' worries, and one special to Lady Le Clerc'ing of velvet. As it is used so much, even on cotton costumes, it is necessary that she should know just how it should be done. Dressmakers prefer to cut velvet with the pile running up, for then it doesn't flatten down from wear; however, no matter which way you may cut it, at least half a dozen silks.

When you cut any figured or floral design do not make the mistake of cutting two pieces in one, as often does with plain goods; the figures and stripes should always match perfectly, and this is not possible when two thicknesses are together.

Always velvet fabric with the pile on the far side, then the right side by laying the first one on the material and following its outlines, the result will be waste of fabric and irregular folds. The same care in measuring must be taken with such one, and it is not wise to rely on the eye for exactness, but to measure the pile with chalk and then to cut it.—Exchange.

It is well nigh impossible for men to understand the mental state of outcasts. As Mr. Hammerhead tells us, "We always respect one or two mistakes; either we must take that the beasts have great knowledge because they are so clever, or else we fancy that they must be stupid because they are so ignorant."

A GHASTLY NECKTIE.

Awful Experience of a Mining Prospector in a Colorado Landslide.

"Yes, that may be an odd necktie, but it is not the queerest necktie I have worn," Henry B. Gillespie, of Aspen, Col., remarked to a servant at the Grand Pacific as he was removing a little Chicago real estate from his countenance. "I once wore a corpse for a necktie.

"It was in the afternoon of March 10, 1884, that I started up Aspen Mountain to visit a claim which I thought was located upon my land. Should I find that my surmise was wrong I intended to purchase the owner's rights for $75,000, and accordingly I took my mining superintendent with me. It was snowing quite hard. The mine owners refused to allow me to go down the shaft to make level explorations, but consented to let my superintendent do so accompany them. I remained in the shaft house with a few laborers. At exactly 3:40 o'clock one of the miners asked me the time. I had just closed my watch, when, crash! and we were buried into a promiscuous mass of timbers, rock, ore, snow and ice.

"We had been overwhelmed in a genuine Colorado landslide. I fell over a stack of ore bags eveded several feet high. The cast timbers fell so as to allow me about eight inches of leeway. Around my neck, bent into a semicircle by the pressure of the terrible wall of ice and snow that was heaped above me was the lifeless body of the miner who had asked me for the time. Poor fellow, he found that time, all time was before him. His head and shoulders were crushed into a jelly, which the ever shifting weight squeezed around my neck until the torn flesh penetrated my clothing. His lower extremities showed a similar fate on the other side of my head. My breathing was very restricted. A few feet away and resting upon my outstretched right arm was the mangled body of another victim. Three others perished in the shaft.

"There I remained in that silent oppressive cell with my ghastly necktie until midnight, when a rescuing party of 200 inhabitants of the mining range of Roaring Forks cut me out of my ivy prison. The snow had become icy, hence the small army of willing miners found plenty of work for their picks and spades. But if my situation was terrible, what was that of those imprisoned in the mines! They were not as cramped for room and oxygen though.

"Only four men buried in that avalanche were rescued. Now that is how I once wore a peculiar necktie."—Chicago News.

Pocket Knives.

In the window of a shop on Nassau street there are displayed enough pocket knives to make nearly every boy in New York happy. There are knives of every size and price, from ten cents up to twenty-five dollars. Knives with twenty-four blades and nobandles to speak of, and others with beautiful handles and blades made of pot metal. "It is curious," said the dealer, "to watch the manifestations of judgment and caprice on the part of them, on the part of people who come in here to buy. Some men purchase a knife on account of its appearance, and they are the most profitable customers. The young man who may have occasion to lend his knife to his sweetheart wants something dainty in appearance. The lassie she must be pretty, and either of pearl or ivory.

"As a rule the man who knows about cutlery gets a knife with a plain buck-horn handle, with not more than two blades, but he wants them of the best razor steel. Many years ago we used to handle what was called a 'dog knife.' The handle was shaped like the body of a dog, and its one blade, which would not even cut a tender conscience, shut up between the legs of the dog. Every boy in those days had a 'dog knife,' but they have entirely disappeared and the youngsters of the present day never heard of them."—New York Recorder.

Help in Hotels.

"If housekeepers would take a hint from hotels," says a hotel man, "they would have less trouble with servants. Hotel men have no trouble in getting all the help they want, though they offer only moderate wages. The difference is not so much in the work as in the hours. In a private house a girl's labors are from the rising of the sun even into the going down of the same, and she is on duty all the time. She does happen to get through her work and ventures to sit down her mistress is apt to object. In a hotel a girl has certain well defined duties to perform and after they are performed, as a rule, her time is her own. If some such arrangement could be recognized in private homes the servants problem would be much simplified."—New York Tribune.

Recollections of Harvard Professors.

The leading scientific men at Harvard were Agassiz, Peirce and Gould, each not only preeminent in his department, but in a certain sense a pioneer. Peirce was the first American to lay modern mathematics, and to teach his countrymen that what they called by that name hardly formed even the beginnings of the subject; and the same may be said of Gould in astronomy. The latter is one to whose encouraging words and efficient help I must ever feel most deeply indebted; indeed, the wigias which the man and the astronomer were combined in his person powerfully influenced the direction of my activities, and his Astronomical Journal was the medium through which my earliest efforts reached publicity.

Another teacher by example was Commander Charles Henry Davis, who resumed his former position as superintendent of the "Nautical Almanac" the year after I became connected with it. He united all the dash of the old fashioned navy leader with a kindly courtesy toward men and women of every grade which could not be exceeded.—Professor Simon Newcomb in Forum.

GOLDSMITH & CO'S

MAMMOTH

CLOTHING HOUSE

HAS BECOME ONE OF THE FEATURES OF SALT LAKE City, so long has it been established and so entirely has it fulfilled its undertaking, and not only do the dwellers in this city but all visitors to the metropolis profit by the experience of such well-known caterers. The etiquette of clothing is continually changing in certain matters of detail, and a reliable guide of what may and what may not be worn under certain circumstances is almost necessary. That guide is to be found here, an authority on everything from a Child's Kilt Suit to a Gentleman's Full Dress Suit. Aside from this specialty there are thousands of customers who deal habitually with Goldsmith & Co. without wearing full dress suits. This being the house in the northwest where may be seen the masterpiece of Poole and other artists of London, through the subdued tints, it is scarcely to be wondered at what a certain attraction impels many thither who only from choice invest themselves in Goldsmith & Co's beautiful line of Spring Overcoats, Box Coats, Suits and Furnishing Wear. Hats, Caps and Shoes are here to be found in every tasteful guise. Materials from the richest to the cheapest are at hand, and Tailors famed for their fit and cut are kept upon the premises; it is always possible to choose from their immense stock, style of make and mode of finish. The assortment is perhaps the largest and most certainly the richest in Salt Lake City, ranging, as it does, from the most elaborate of Dress Suit to the simplest and plainest Business Tailor-made Suit. Also a fine line of the Mother's Friend Shirt Waists.

Goldsmith & Co.

61, 63 and 65 MAIN STREET, SALT LAKE CITY.

And at BUTTE, OGDEN, SPOKANE FALLS and BALTIMORE.
