TANNING MATERIAL.

COMMERCIAL CULTURE OF CANAIGRE, OR WILD RHUBARB.

(Garden and Forest.)

In the mission regions of the Southwest the Mexicans have for centuries been tanning hides with the roots of a sour dock or wild rhubarb, named hymenosoma, called by the early missionaries sour cane, "canaigre," which was finally pronounced in—or—and spelled canaigre. With the advent of the Anglo-Saxon and the railway, the plant was utilized in the tannery, and recently stock companies have been organized to gather, dry, and sun-dry large quantities of the root of the wild plant, and many carloads have been prepared and shipped to American and European tanneries. A complete tanning extract is also made, which is very similar to the gambier tanning extract, derived from the leaves and young twigs of an East Indian tree. The United States imports gambier to the extent of a million and a half dollars annually, and also sends abroad for tanning materials to the value of a million dollars more. The world's yearly crop of gambier is valued at two million dollars, and nearly all of it is shipped from Leith to Great Britain, and is thence exported to the other European nations, and to America, being wholesaled at from 4 to 5 cents per pound. Canaigre finds its market compelling in gambier, as the tanning properties of the two substances are very similar.

Leather acquires from canaigre a clearer, brighter orange color than does any other tanning material. The use of even a small quantity gives a brighter yellow hue to the leather, and it is the very best material for coloring pony tanned hides. The great value of canaigre lies in the fact that it tans quickly, dries deeply, and seems to give strength to the skin, durable, impervious rather than stiff, very supple and pliable. It is adapted to the tanning of fancy leather, sports, saddlery and the finest kinds of sole leather, as the product is of a pleasing color, and neither stiffens nor weaks. As it is the first to act on the hide, a small amount of canaigre, used with pine or other barks, causes the latter to tan the leather more rapidly and uniformly. Hence there is an increasing demand for this new American tanning material. Canaigre is a dock-like plant of narrow-leaved rhubarb, growing during the moister weather of a southwestern fall and winter, and throwing up a seed-stalk three feet high, bearing pink flowers, which change to purple. The valuable part is the tuberous roots, which resemble a cluster of sweet potatoes. These tubers are the permanent part of the plant, making their growth before the hot dry summer, which kills all of the plant above ground. The roots continue to grow and increase in tannic for years. The tannic acid in the green root increases from 4 per cent in the young root to 10 per cent in the old. The tannic in the slender root varies from 15 per cent in the young root to 45 per cent in the old. The leaves and stems contain 3 per cent of tannic when green, and 6 per cent when dry. One-year-old tubers, when air-dried, are about one-fourth tannic.

A moist, sandy soil is preferred by canaigre, but it also grows on the mesa and other high land. In many of the wild roots have been gathered that the supply of canaigre within a profitable distance of the railroad is already limited. The plant, however, bears cultivation well, and the experiment stations at Tucson, Arizona, and at Las Cruces, New Mexico, have tested various methods of its culture and irrigation. The soil is prepared as it would be for potatoes or other root crops, being mellowed as deeply as possible. As the crop does not grow during the summer, it is best planted in the fall, though a complete season's growth is obtained thereby, as the spring-planted canaigre will make some growth before becoming dormant for the summer. The plant produces as little mature seed as the common potato does, and the delicate seedlings are much more tender than mature seedlings. Hence canaigre is propagated from tubers, as the common potato is, with this advantage, that the seed tuber for the canaigre crop does not decay or die, but increases its contents of the valuable tannic, so that the tubers which have reached in plant an acre is of itself a sale and profitable investment. Though the roots may be cut very small for seed, there is thus little advantage in such treatment. Canaigre is so tenacious of life that the tubers in the ground will not die from neglect or drought, but its yield increases in proportion to the amount of rainfall, moisture or irrigation, the weeding and the cultivation. It may be started the fall and spring. The treatment and cost per acre is about the same as for potatoes, though it should have an extra fall irrigation, which the potatoes, of course, do not get.

The canaigre crop may be harvested at any time, though the largest yield is obtained when dormant in summer, and the greatest amount of tannin just after it begins to sprout in the fall. The cultivated roots are dug with any plow or machine that will harvest potatoes. As large tubers of various of the green roots will rot on spoil from the incrustation, the roots are spread out to a thin layer, to dry in the air and sunshine, or when thus spread sun-dried with earth to keep them plump. The tubers withstand drouth and desert conditions so long that it is almost necessary to dies them in order to air-dry them thoroughly. The roots will keep best as they grow in the ground and should remain there until the crop is to be marketed and the field replanted. As the bulk of cultivated tubers makes nearly all of the growth the first year, the crop needs no attention during succeeding years if left under, while the premium taunic acid increases from 10 per cent in the one-year-old roots to 30 per cent in the two-year-olds, and the third year may reach even 35 per cent, and the valuable coloring matter increases even faster with age. The cultivation of canaigre is at present much hampered by the necessary cost of railway transportation to the distant tanneries, but it seems probable that by a diffusion process similar to that used with the sugar beet, an extract will soon be made from the roots (from either fresh or dried roots, to contain from two-thirds to three-fourths of pure tannic acid, thus saving at least one-third of the freight. Dried canaigre roots commands $25 per ton in the American tanneries, and its intrinsic merits for tanning are only beginning to be appreciated. The culture of canaigre for tanning is certainly worthy of trial. It may prove a very useful crop for the warmer semi-arid regions of the Great Plains, including a large area in western Texas.

TWO MEETINGS WITH MILES.

One In Pasadena, Cal., and the Other In Los Angeles.

"One night in the office of the Hotel Raymond in Pasadena, Cal.," said a traveler, "I met General Nelson A. Miles. I was introduced to him by Major Ben C. Truman. The office was a big apartment with a great fireplace in one end of it. There were large rocking chairs scattered about for the comfort of guests who chose to sit there, and it was a room to which ladies did not hesitate to come if they had occasion to visit it.

"On this night there was a fire in the great fireplace, perhaps as much for cheerfulness' sake or anything else, and the big room was decidedly a pleasant place. General Miles, Major Truman and myself sat there until 11 o'clock. The general talked freely and most interestingly, and to me it was a most enjoyable evening. I had always had the beneficial admiration for General Miles—I had been a soldier myself—and I thought I should always remember that evening with gratification.

"The next morning, while going out of the Hotel Nadeau in Los Angeles, I met a gentleman who said 'Good morning.' I stopped and talked, but I could not possibly recall him. Presently he said:

"'You don't remember me.'

"'I said I did not.

"'My name is Miles,' he said.

"Well, I wished that the Hotel Nadeau had been getting in coal and that there had been a convenient coal hole open for me to slide into, but there wasn't, and I did the best I could under the circumstances, which I guess was poor enough, but the general was politely good hearted about it, for which I was personally thankful.

"Seeing the general in a different light, or could totally different one sentiment and when I had been expected to meet him, coupled perhaps with some degree of mental disturbance on my part, had brought this discomfiture upon me, and chagrin over this wound remained with General Miles has always mentally branded my cowardice of the first."—New York Sun.

SUGAR MAKING IN CUBA.

The Crude Methods That Were In Use Twenty Years Ago.

Twenty years ago, in those times of slavery and high prices, but little attention was given to machinery in sugar making. Planters were content to get a bad fortune of cane they could from an acre of land.

The cane was brought to the sugar house, where the laborers slowly put it on the carrier, passing it to the mill, where it was rolled or ground between the rolls of a three roller mill to extract the juice, getting an extraction of 50 per cent out of a possible 65 or 70 per cent of the whole weight in the cane.

The cane was brought to the sugar house "green," which was a set of long or five-inches set in brickwork, having a strong fire under the smaller or "strike" kettle. The flames passed under and around all the kettles, the uncovered juice escaping through a chimney. The combustion was so imperfect that at night flames could be seen many feet high, coming from the top of the chimney.

The largest of these kettles received the raw juice, and there it was limed and skimmed as the impurities rose. It was then ladled to the next kettle in succession, each time being thickened in density and refined in bulk by evaporation until it arrived at the "strike" kettle, where a skilled attendant knew the exact point at which to stop the fire and ladle out the mass into the crystallizing pans, in which it was allowed to cool.

In a few days it was free enough to be taken out, placed in hogsheads and allowed to drain in the storehouse, yielding at least one-third in dripping molasses. The hogsheads were then repacked and placed in carts and drawn many miles to the railroad for shipment to the merchants' stores at the seaport, where they were again allowed to drain, were repacked, reweighed and sold, thus piling up an expense account that made the profits look slim; but, as sugar was selling at a high rate, these expenses could be borne.—A. W. Colwell in Cassier's Magazine.

Social Life Long Ago.

The stately dames of the court of Edward IV rose with the lark, dined at 11 a. m. and retired to rest at 8 in the evening. Henry VIII went back to 10 in the morning for dinner and had supper at 4. In Queen Bess' days her maids of honor began the day with a round of beef served hot and a flagon of ale for breakfast at about 6 or 7 and dined at 11, and then went to the playhouse in the afternoon, not later than 3, sometimes as early as 12:30, according to the order of the play and the day.

Leonardo da Vinci.

Leonardo da Vinci, being a great architect and engineer, as well as painter and sculptor, left notebooks proving that he had studied the flight of birds and had planned flying machines to be driven by wings or by screw propellers. But as Leonardo was good at figures he seems to have abandoned his plans after finding out how much force would be needed.—Tales Jonks in St. Nicholas.
