UNDERGROUND ROADS

London's Railway System Turned Over to an American Syndicate.

AN ENORMOUS CAPITALIZATION.

One of the Richest Investors Said to be a Well Known Capitalist in St. Louis.

ST. LOUIS, Oct. 22.—The Republic this morning says:

A stupendous deal, involving a radical change in the proprietorship and system of operation of one of the most extensive street railway properties in the world has been practically completed. An American syndicate headed, it is said, secured control of the famous underground railways of London, England. The syndicate was formed in London, Canada, and Boss McKane is at the head of it. Capitalists from New York, Philadelphia and other cities are also interested and in all the neatest interests is stated to be a well known St. Louis man, whose name for the present is withheld.

The property controlled is supposed realized to be under the control of a syndicate for an order to capture the British prize has not been necessitated, but it is easy to, in the minions, as the underground system of London have always been conservatives and constitute a magnificent property.

Owing to the necessity of acquiring no end, considerable other owners and to the expense of diverting sewers, making tunnels, etc., the underground system is evidenced to cost not less than at $5,000,000 a mile. In order to properly appreciate the magnitude of this deal and the extent to which is the influence of American enterprise, progressiveness and energy, the present cost of the underground system of London, the English metropolis must be well understood. Unlike its country, Great Britain has for years been at a standstill in future growth of their towns in cities. There are not a score cities railways in the country but not a single cable and but a dozen subways in the cities were so to speak, the new cities. Contrary to this, to the west spoke to out in wide structures, as Chicago and St. Louis, and in the underground railways.

THE BRIGGS CASE.

Another Phase of it Now Under Discussion.

NEW YORK, Oct. 22.—The Briggs case came up at the recent meeting of the State Presbyterian synod. The N. Y. Presbytery was the primary cause of the trouble and the Rev. James Gardiner, Hoverville, chairman of the judicial committee, the necessity.

In the spring of 1893 the N. Y. Presbytery decided to set the general assembly whether it should receive under or change a seminary whose teachings were in direct of the general assembly, notably the Union Theological seminary. The general assembly in reply replied the Presbytery of the Union Seminary care for Romanic students in theological seminaries respecting whose teachings the general assembly disclaimed responsibility."

The Presbytery dissented from this on the ground that it only cases concerning its relations to the general assembly and it maintains its right to plead business to any man who gave sufficient proof of his preparation, no matter where he had been instructed. It accordingly dissented last spring when students in Union were refused the doctrine of the general assembly and the anti-Briggs followers made complaint to the recent meeting of the synod. The synod was referred to the judicial committee. When Dr. Gardner report on the meeting of the state presbytery at Brooklyn he said that the Presbytery thought it best to remove from the whole case be dismissed but that in this way it circle to end. The synod insisted immediately. Everybody enjoys the complaints wanted to drop the case, but the honorable court that the committee had not been sent to bring in such a report and would not entertain a resolution. After an hour's talk and discussion it was discovered that the report had not been accepted and the case had not been dismissed. Then to other report of the judicial committee omitting the trial was read and not accepted, as the case was logical not to be an administrative one, inasmuch as it involved no case of disciplinary and was strictly theological. When this was done, a motion was declared to refer the case to a commission of fifteen to take testimony and give a decision.

Branches of the Scandinavian Society in the American Colonies.

The society is organized for the purpose of affording the poor and middle classes an opportunity of purchasing supplies and the necessities of life direct from the producers, growers and manufacturers, thereby saving to the purchaser the profits of the wholesale and middlemen. December, which closed yesterday at 70½, opened with sales generally 2 cents a bushel higher, but with buyers varying in different parts of the city all the way from 72 to 73½. After the first fun, quotations quickly dropped from 72½ to a level and then a straight line to 71½. Then there whirled upward a mad and back to 72½ for December.
